"THE THIRD WARNING"

Continued

"I'm going to stick it to the end!" I banged the table with my fist in sudden vehemence. "I tell you, Smith, I won't clear out for man or devil—" "You won't alter your mind?" "I tell you I'm going to see it through!" "It's a pity," murmured Smith slowly.

"Why is it a pity—" The rest of the sentence was a mere gurgle in my throat. For Smith had suddenly pulled open a drawer in front of him. And now he was leaning forward, gazing at me. His eyes seemed to have narrowed to brown pin points of light. And in his hand was a revolver that was pointing between my eyes.

"My friend!" His voice was hard and metallic; the easy draw had gone, the Bohemian air thrown off. "My friend, if you will not clear out of your own accord, you must be cleared out. You have had three warnings. You have taken none of them."

He suddenly looked past me over my shoulder and nodded. The door must have been silently opened behind me. For at Smith's nod a cloth was thrown round my face. And hands gripped my wrists and ankles. I kicked and struggled, but in a couple of minutes was bound and helpless on the floor. Then I was picked up and carried out by strong hands.

The last thing I heard in that room was a laugh. Smith had said some words and there was laughter that made me tingle with bursting rage. For of a sudden, I recognized it. The laughter was Seymour's.

I took little stock of what happened to me during the next ten minutes; I was too shaken up for any kind of consecutive thoughts. I had been tricked—tricked by an amazingly clever man—and the utter surprise of Smith's last move had left me winded. When I got my breath, as it were, hurt pride writhed and rankled within me. I had beaten them so far; last night I scored a decisive point, or at least I had prevented them from scoring; and now I had gone and botched everything like a stupid fly!

I had run right into the spider's web, and of course the spider was on me in a flash. Fool, fool, I kept saying to myself—wasn't my first experience at Black Edge enough to warn anybody but an idiot that something was wrong? That dog, that yellow-faced ruffin; how weren't there for nothing. And how beautifully I had swallowed Smith's explanations; how like a babe had seen my acceptance of his invitation! A gilt tongue, an easy manner and it was all over!

Then I began to realize what had happened to me. The place was in pitch darkness, and I was sitting on a box with my legs tightly lashed to it. My back against a wooden pillar, and my arms were locked round it, my wrists roped together. In fact, I was as closely imprisoned as if I had been in the Bastille. The cloth had been taken from my face and I recollected how a growling voice had threatened that if I squealed there was a nice little gag ready which it would be a great joy to insert. But what was the use of shouting? I was miles from anywhere, in one of the loneliest spots in the Lammerruirs. In the darkness I could see nothing except a few stars that glimmered in a tiny crack high on the wall. Estimating from the distance I had been carried, I concluded I was locked up in one of the barns.

The minutes passed, and seemed to lengthen into hours. My hands and feet grew numb with the tightly bound cords that pinned me. Vainly I searched for a mode of escape, but everything came back to the indisputable fact; I was helpless. A guest of sudden anger shook me, and I tore at my bonds with every ounce of strength. If I could slightly loosen the cords, I might pull out one hand and so free myself. It was just possible there was a careless knot somewhere that might be slipped. I tugged and bent and twisted, a wild rage against my captors giving me the strength of two men. Soon the sweat was pouring from my face, and every muscle ached as if it had been beaten with a heavy stick. I think I went mad for ten minutes.

But it was useless. The cords held firm. These knots had been tied by no amateur. Exhausted, I lay back against the wooden beam and gasped for breath. And then I heard footsteps and voices. Heavy boots rang on the cobbles of the farmyard, but I could make nothing of the voices at all. There was the opening and shutting of some distant doors, and of a sudden one voice seemed to ring out above the others. I recognized it immediately. It was undoubtedly the voice of Shaw.

At this, another surge of wild wrath set me trembling. So this was where he had disappeared to! He was in league with Seymour and Smith! It was the hands of these three that had been against me all along. It was these three who for some obscure reason of their own desired my discomfiture! Well, they had got it. Eagerly I longed for that rascal of a clergyman to come in to me here; to show himself before the lash of my angry tongue. Better still to have five minutes with him alone, and just my fists to tackle him with; but even to tell him what I thought of him and his arch-rogues would have given me solace. It would at any rate have been a few bright moments to look back on during the long hours of the night that had already fallen.

His voice rang out again. Heavens, I was wrong! I was on the wrong track altogether! The voices and footsteps were fading, and I could still hear Shaw's voice above the others. But he was not issuing orders. He was not issuing orders. He was speaking in a loud tone of protest!

The other voices were muttering angrily and impatiently, but Shaw spoke with a note of shrill and impassioned complaint; and though I could catch no words, it was at once evident to me that he was in the same box as myself—helpless. A door slammed and shut off further sounds.

THE IMPORTED REGISTERED
Clydesdale Stallion Craigenflower
25895—21194

will stand for service at the Agricultural Hall, Charlottetown, for the season of 1930.

This big, stylish, brown horse has the quality, substance bone and action necessary in a high class sire.

At the Ottawa Show, shortly after an ocean voyage, Craigenflower stood next to Lascelles, the grand champion at the Canadian National Exhibition, 1929. Expert horse judges pronounce him one of the best stallions in Canada.

This splendid stallion, sired by the popular Aucheflower (12007) and out of a dam by the World famous Baron of Buchlyvie (9958) proved a successful sire in Scotland where he commanded a wide patronage at fee of $25.00.

The breeding and quality of this horse is of the very choicest, and owners of mares should give him an inspection before breeding.
 Terms $12.00 cash or $15.00 on approved notes due November 15th, 1930.
