"Billy Batson! That settles it. I don't hold with circuses no more, much anyway—no unless there's animals and children. You ought to know about em. But you might as well go this in the wagon along with Uncle Jim's folks. If that would be done you with a Batson, indeed! Remember, miss, your grandfather went to the legislature!" Mrs. Hicks said witheringly to her daughter Amelia, who pouted and answered sullenly: "I wish he'd died first. Then you couldn't be always throwing him at everybody until we're laughingstocks. And Billy Batson has got the finest horse and the nicest buggy around here. Any girl—Sophy Welles' even—would jump at the chance to ride in it. You'd want me to jump, too, if it wasn't for that sneaky preacher. I tell you right now you needn't try to make me marry him. I won't do it! I won't!"

"Hain't you better wait till you're asked?" Mrs. Hicks asked, with her finest sarcasm.

"Amelia laughed—a laugh not pleasant to hear. "I ain't a fool—not if I am your daughter," she retorted. "I know what you're plotting, you two, and that you want him for a son-in-law, so you can boss the church, as you've always bossed things here."

"Amelia Hicks! I am ashamed of you!" Mrs. Hicks cried severely, then, with a snarl: "But maybe I deserve it. I took your father rather 'n listen to my missionary call. And this is what I get for it—a thankless tooth sharper 'n a serpent's child."

Amelia giggled. "That's about the way you commonly get things, and she said irreverently. "Now, you listen to me, ma. You hate old mads—so do I—and Billy Batson is the best chance I'll ever have in my life. He's going to court me this trip—I know it—never mind how. If you don't let me go, he'll court somebody else."

"Lord grant it!" Mrs. Hicks broke in fervently. Amelia frowned. "You think, then, I might put up with your Brother—Gilliam?" she said bitterly. "But I'd a—I'd even be an old maid, first, the surest, ugliest that ever turned sweet milk."

"Oh, do hush!" Mrs. Hicks interrupted, fretfully, but turning away her head to hide a flickering crafty smile. "If nothing will do you but to sink to the level of the Batsons, why, I suppose, I must let you. But you must let me talk to Billy before you start."

"What for?" Amelia asked suspiciously. Her mother laughed sourly. "For no great matter," she said. "You may hear every word I say. Does that satisfy you?"

"Looks like it ought to," Amelia said ungraciously. "But, understand, you ain't going to mention Gilliam!"

"Of course not. Pearls ain't to be cast before swines," Mrs. Hicks said, with a toss of her head.

Amelia eyed her distrustfully for a long minute, then walked off, muttering to herself, "If only she sticks to her word, she can't do any great harm."

Amelia thought she knew her mother, particularly as regarded the depths of her deceit, but she stared in dumb amazement at Billy Batson's reception. No May morning ever smelled more engagingly on him than Mrs. Hicks. She shook hands with fervor and asked in her sweetest voice after the health of his family. She was also hearty in admiration of his spanking turnout and wished him all sorts of a good time—the full worth of his money in pleasure. Then she added artlessly that she herself had never seen a real circus. A manager of one elephant power was as near as she had come. A pity, to be sure! No, she had no scruples. It just somehow never quite suited for her to go when circus day came round. Somebody had been sick or there was work to do. Mr. Hicks had gone—men always went—but that didn't mean stopping a plow, as would have been the case had she insisted. Of course she would have had to have the mules and roadways. Now that she was a widow she had not felt it was just the thing to do. A circus seemed somehow to require having a man along. Maybe she would go next time—her nephew Freddy Drawn was growing up so fast.

"Then Billy said boldly, with a sheepish glance toward Amelia, "Oh, maybe you'll have a son-in-law, and if he don't take you, why, ask me to trash him for you!"

"If you're willin' to do that for me, maybe you won't mind doin' 'some-thing' else—lettin' me go 'long with you and Amelia today. It's dreadful lonely stayin' at home and watchin' all the neighborhood go by," Mrs. Hicks said, with a plaintive smile.

Billy gasped, but could not refuse. Amelia stood thunderstruck. She turned half about, meaning to say she would not go, but a glance at her mother's face stopped her. Her mother was counting upon Freddy for her daughter. If Billy saw her fly into a tantrum he might well be scared off. So she controlled herself and clambered up into the buggy, outwardly smiling, but inwardly getting her teeth.

The buggy was high and the seat so narrow it barely held two persons. Billy had to kneel upon the floor, steady his himself with the reins as best he might. It was more than agreeable. He had the finest horse on the road and had counted on giving that to everything else there was less than on having the prettiest lady in the county.

at his side. Now he drove at almost a foot pace, partly because of the added weight, but much more because he wanted to keep away from sight of his acquaintances.

Naturally conversation languished. For awhile Mrs. Hicks kept up a sprightly chatter, but after a mile or two even she fell silent. Amelia sat with clinched hands, ready to cry between anger and mortification. Of course Billy would be angry. He had a right to be. Not with her, to be sure—but, then, how could she expect him to discriminate? Her mother, she knew well, had the name of being proud and a schemer. There would be plenty of folks to tell Billy, if he did not think of it himself, that the whole thing had been planned between mother and daughter for purpose to make him ridiculous.

Being self-made, he was keenly sensitive. Unless she could make him understand her innocence she had lost him, and she did not want to lose him. She loved ever fiber of his six foot ruddy comeliness as she hated the oily languish of Brother Gilliam.

Her heart leaped when Gilliam drew up alongside the buggy and said, trying to speak jocularly: "Why, Batson, don't you think there are laws against matrimony? Here I'm driving to town without a soul to bear me company. Divide, man, divide! I know it's hard to choose, but you must give me a passer."

"I have to mind the preacher, don't I, Mrs. Hicks?" Billy asked over his shoulder, making way for her and checking his horse as he spoke. He of course could not choose, but she must understand that she was in the way.

But Mrs. Hicks sat tight, giggling and saying airily: "Indeed you do, mister Batson! Out the wheels the least mile more, then Amelia can step across—no need in the world of your gettin' out to help her—and Brother Gilliam can meet us at the Mathewses. Their yard is such a good place to see the parade."

There must have been fate in it, else Amelia would have refused. But some power beyond herself compelled her to whirl forward beside the man she hated. Billy glared after them and set his teeth. He made no pretense of civil talk to the woman beside him. His heart was so sore, his mind so angry. It was almost a miracle that he did not drive into or over somebody. But by good hap he got safe to his journey's end and found himself a little later, with Mrs. Hicks at his elbow, wedged into the throng which lined the street on either side.

Amelia and the minister were just across the way. Neither couple had had time to reach the Mathews haven. The parade was already moving when they came to town, so they had made what shift and haste they might.

It was a piteous parade, something tawdry throughout, and in spots dusty and threadbare. But the lady riders had superb horses and sat them wonderfully, especially Sandra, queen of amazons, who in green and gold lace blew kisses right and left from her finger tips, the while making her milk white Arab keep time with the band blaring ahead.

Sandra was slight and round, with everywhere about her the suggestion of supple strength. She carried a crop
