Constipation

Relieved Without The Use of Laxatives
Nujol is a lubricant—not a medicine or laxative—so cannot grip.

When you are constipated, not enough of Nature's lubricating liquid is produced in the bowel to keep the food waste soft and moving. Doctors prescribe Nujol because it acts like this natural lubricant and thus secures regular bowel movements by Nature's own method—lubrication. Try it today.

The Girl Who Had No Chance

By MARION RUBINCAM

NEW PLANS Chapter 72

Ruth cried most of her nervousness away, and Langley sat quietly holding her until the hysteria went out of her sobs and she was calmer. He was so tall that when he impulsively gathered her up in his arms, she curled up on his lap like a small child. She remembered afterwards that he did not even try to kiss her—he simply held her until she stopped crying.

Then she looked up, and a little feeling of self-consciousness came over her. She stifled, and he let her go at once. In fact, he picked her up and put her back on the couch, throwing the old knitted blanket over her feet.

Then he sat on the edge of the couch and took her hand. There was something very sweet and big brotherly in the way he had chosen to show his sympathy. Ruth was not unstrung at the time to think about it, but afterwards she realized how gentle and competent and dependable he was and how he had almost charmed away the nervousness.

"Tell me about your Father—I mean when he was young," he begged. Ruth began to talk—and it was comforting to talk about the little man she had loved so dearly.

"He always knew whatever bothered me. I never even had to tell him," she ended her story. "But I always did tell him, even things I couldn't tell Mother. Except about—Tim. And that was so big and serious and he was ill, and after all it's pretty hard to confess to your father about a man who didn't care about you."

"Tim," Langley repeated the name for the first time. Ruth had told him about her love affair and he had told her about his; indeed, after the change of confidences, their friendship had grown the warmer. But either Ruth had never mentioned the name, or else Langley had not taken any notice of it.

"Tim," he repeated. "Now I remember that was the first name of the young chap I did out of a job in one office in New York city—the chap who gave me a letter to you."

"That's the one." "Yes, I remember now, I felt badly about losing his place, but he was not needed in that organization, and I found him a place in another firm."

"Where he liked it so well that he worked very hard and was raised in salary until he could afford to get married."

Trial Of Priests A Ghastly Farce

(From the New York Herald.)
By Francis McCullagh.

(The following story of the trial of the Catholic prelates by the Russian Soviets was written before the execution of Vicar-General Butchkevitch, the delay in its arrival being due to the difficulty of getting it by messenger out of Moscow to a point where it could safely be cabled.)

MOSCOW, March 26.—Before describing the trial of Archbishop Zeniak and a dozen of his clergy at the Moscow trial which ended last night, I should say I do not describe from hearsay.

I attended every sitting from the first day to the last, sometimes going without food or sleep in order to do so and send telegraphic accounts afterwards. Whether any of these telegrams ever reached my paper I do not know.

The Bolshevik foreign office refused tickets for the trial to all correspondents, though they were ready enough to supply admission cards for Red army parades and Bolshevik meetings. Being an old hand at journalism I got in, but not as a press man. Later on other correspondents obtained admission.

I should also say I am personally acquainted with none of the prisoners and don't know a single Pole in the city.

For the past two years the Polish people have been antipathetic to me and I never called on Polish representatives here or got a single bit of information from Polish sources, directly or indirectly. As to the Polish priests put on trial here I was in the beginning rather prejudiced against them than otherwise.

For I dislike priests in politics. But I have carefully listened to all the evidence in every case. These Petrograd priests never engaged in any plot against the Soviet government. Their persecution was on religious grounds alone. It is the first item in a program for the destruction of Christianity in Russia.

War on Christianity
Krylenko and Procurer Gelkin, the judge, made this perfectly clear. They asked every one of the clerical prisoners whether they had taught the catechism to children and every prisoner answered yes. They then read the Bolshevik law which makes it a crime to impart religious teaching to anyone under 18 and asked each prisoner if he would continue to teach the catechism. The reply in every case was yes, and always delivered in a firm tone and sometimes accompanied by a smile—a smile of pity, I fancy, for the ignorance of a man who would ask such a question of their flocks in Petrograd during the last five years of terror.

The archbishop's face lit with pleasure and surprise when he answered. It was as if he had been asked if he could see the way to accept miraculous gift of health, youth and unlimited riches. Behind the prelate sat the young priest, Edward Yunevich, newly ordained. Joy flashed in his eyes and radiance in his whole countenance when asked if, in obedience with the Bolshevik law, he would cease teaching children their catechism. Joyousness so marked his voice that three Bolshevik judges who were all smoking cigarettes at the time looked up simultaneously in some surprise.

Would Not Cease Saying Mass.

The priests were next asked if, after the churches had been closed, they dared disobey the Bolshevik law by saying mass. Yes, of course, they all said mass. Not only did they own up to the crime but admitted there was always a congregation of about 100 or 200.

They used empty halls for the purpose. Petrograd is about half empty and there are many halls and suites of rooms available for such services, though in the winter time the cold in those unheated rooms must have been extremely severe.

And to the surprise of the Red judges they would not promise to cease saying mass. This case, however, does not concern Roman Catholics alone. It concerns all religions, including the Jews. It is a crime under the Bolshevik law to impart religious teaching to any person under the age of 18 years, even though the teacher be the mother and the pupil her child.

This law, therefore, strikes at all religions and at one of the most sacred rights of parents.

Some Filmy Charges.
Some of these incidents were of the filmiest character. Take the case of the priest who fell "demonstratively" upon his knees when a couple of Red hooligans entered his church after service and ordered the congregation out of it. The priest in question was nearly blind, as was obvious to everyone in court, who watched his movements during the trial.

He had not seen the intruders, and simply knelt down before the blessed sacrament after he had finished mass. But Krylenko insisted that his action in falling upon his knees was an appeal to the religious fanaticism of his parishioners and therefore punishable under an article in the Bolshevik penal code.

The priest got ten years. The audience were worthy of the judges and the procurer—at least the Communist portion of it. They actually applauded when Krylenko, writhing and frothing at the mouth like a madman, made his second and final demand for the six lives; and the presiding judge did not attempt to quiet the audience. But half an hour later, when some Poles clapped their hands in approval of a moving and unanswerable appeal for the men's lives, made by one of the lawyers for the defence, the same judge furiously threatened to have the room cleared if this demonstration were repeated.

Next day an attempt was made to admit only Communists to the court, and only persons able to exhibit cards of membership in the Communist party or some Bolshevik organization were allowed to enter. On the last day, however, many Polish women got in somehow, and their lamentations when the verdict was pronounced were the most heart-rending sound I ever heard in my life. Even then, however, the Communists were in the majority, and their jeers and laughs and observations disgusting to the last degree.

Some Repulsive Types.
One unshaven, bestial looking visage in front of me shall never be forgotten. During all the time the condemned were pleading for their lives, that abominable face was set in a perpetual grin, with mouth open and one yellow tusk visible. Worst of all, it swung round at intervals and fixed its blood-shot eyes on me, as if insisting upon an answering sympathetic laugh.

They showed it the very first day, when the defence raised the question of procedure.

The defence said: "Here are a series of incidents—refusal to sign an agreement with the Soviet government regarding church property; refusal to evacuate the church promptly when called upon to do so, etc." We propose that these matters be taken up separately, and that the prosecution prove them to be breaches of the law."

Krylenko objected to this, insisting that all of these isolated incidents be taken together as part of a general counter-revolutionary conspiracy against the Soviet government, and three judges upheld his objection.

They were also, I am sorry to say, Polish faces just as cruel, callous and repulsive. One of a type hardly human, with little sunken eyes, was in a perpetual state of merriment. These were the faces of Polish Communists who have formed a Bolshevik organization here under the patronage of the Kremlin, and who were encouraged by the Soviet government to attend, that they might goot over their unfortunate countrymen in the dock.

Poland certainly is to be congratulated for having got rid of these degenerate renegades, with no nationality, no morals, no religion, no honor, but Russia is to be sympathized with for all the bitterness and obliquity of the human species.
