After Ten Years

BY MARION RUBINCAM COMMON SENSE Chapter 71

After all, Paul was quite right. When two people are in love, there isn't anything to argue about.

Paul had said he could not get along with her. And Patty, from somewhere in the furriness of his glove, had whispered that she could not get along without her. Then the only argument she had left was that Paul's mother would object to their friendship.

"Do you mind what Mother thinks?" Paul asked, his arm around her.

"No," she answered.

"Anyway," Paul went on, "she doesn't know. She will like you when she does."

He wasn't so sure of that. But he wanted to convince Patty, and he rather hoped to convince himself.

"Do you think so?" She's very keen about money and social position," Patty said. "It wouldn't have been so bad if I hadn't come on to New York to be a secretary to this Committee."

"If you hadn't come, I wouldn't have seen you again."

"Then I'm glad I came." And she raised her face towards him, knowing he would kiss her again.

And he did. Her cheeks, burned and her whole being tingled. The wind's cold was welcome when it blew across her face. She had never been so happy!

And they were talking nonsense, only it didn't matter.

"Yes, Mother will like you. She has to," Paul went on. "Mother goes through odd enthusiasms. You said a moment ago she wants me to marry Miriam—that's true. She should have sense enough to know that the fact I know she wants me to, would put me out of the note."

"A thousand pounds lifted from somewhere in the region of Patty's bag."

"She thinks this idea of working is all nonsense," the girl said, trying to be fair and to give Paul all the objections. "And when she knows I started you on that she'd never forgive me. And anyway, there's no reason for you to work."

"Why do you? You miss a lot!" "Now, Patty," Paul began, "you don't want me to take you serious, do you. Don't you honestly understand I ought to do something useful in the world?"

She hesitated, and he insisted again.

say, I'll tell them to you tomorrow night." They were quiet again until they reached her door. Patty wondered whether they were engaged.

"Listen, Sweeties, I have to think out a lot of things. And tomorrow we'll talk about them."

guessed what had happened. Patty was obviously so excited and happy!

He ran his car slowly around the streets to his house, and left it at the curb. Two motors already stood there, his mother's party had already arrived, apparently.

He had it been the fashion, Mrs. Darlington would have done this too. Essentially the two women were alike.

"Ah, the little secretary! I am not aware of any necessity to ask secretaries and typists."

Paul turned deliberately and walked out of the room. To stay was to grow uncontrollably angry. It was better to be rude. Here was a dilemma! And he felt hopeless before it.

When you will be nice to her? "Then you will be nice to her?" Paul begged. "Nice to her? I hope I am, nice as you call it, to every one, everyone who isn't rude. Of course, I've often been nice to her, whenever I've seen her."

"But I mean I want to bring her here, I want to bring her to see you." "Really, Paul, it won't do at all. Paul could almost feel the low fumes in the temperature dropped, so is no longer applicable.
