The Green Hussar
By HENRY VON RHAN

CHAPT. I
His Majesty the King!

The voice rang clear through the still night air. The sentry's pace came to a precise halt. Heavy boot-heels cracked together. A rifle snapped to a smart present. The voice again, compelling, clear, commanding, "Turn out the guard! The King!"

A confusion of sounds, of men moving, of rifles being snatched, and of stumbling, hurrying feet.

A car glided to a stop. A footman flung himself upon the handle of the door and swung it open. A youthful, graceful form stepped out, garbed in the brilliant uniform of the Green Hussars. Light, quick footsteps fell on an ancient flagstone courtyard. A soft voice, gently, and vastly bored, "Never mind the guard!"

Within the guardhouse a moment's pause, then the shuffle of slumbering, heavy boots and of sleepy, yawning commentaries, of rifles being replaced in racks, belts loosening, and heavy bodies dropping on their iron cots again. A moment later, blissful snores.

The great iron door of the east wing of the Palace swung back silently. Two footmen bowed. The King entered. The doors closed, smoothly, quietly.

He glanced down the corridor, high-ceilinged, stately, cold, austere.

Cherry little place, murmured the King.

Like tiny tinkling bells, silver spur-chains jingled as they touched plush carpets, soft as early spring-time grass. The corridor seemed endless. The King hummed a stanza of his own composition: "I've never swooned for the love of a lass.

And never have envied my neighbor's ass;
The only thing that I want to be
Is a cavalier on a jam-bor-ee!"

Behind him in heavy silence

strode Feval Haas, his side, his hand twitching nervously, and now and then his near-set eyes darting a strange look at the King's back.

The corridor turned sharply to the left. A soldier with side arms stiffened to attention. Wonderingly, the King halted before the sentry.

What's all this martial splendor? he asked.

The old soldier's pleasant, chubby face grew scarlet, his childish eyes bewildered, frightened.

Your Majesty—the stammered.

What are you doing here? the King asked gently.

Sire, answered the soldier, I am to permit no one except members of your Majesty's suite to pass this corridor or enter your Majesty's study.

The King whistled softly.

That sounds serious, he muttered, but after all it gives you something to do. Keep an alert watch, sentry. I've heard footsteps scampering down these corridors late at night; I think—they were nice! If you catch them, arrest them by all means!

With a pleasant nod the King turned away.

Feval Haas opened a door. The King entered his study. A cherry fire was burning. A clock ticked briskly atop a marble mantelpiece, before which stood two elegant gentlemen—one in horizon blue with a fine face, twinkling blue eyes, and light golden curls cropped short, the other, slim and lithe like the King and, like him, wearing the uniform of the Green Hussars with an unconscious air of swagger and sense of devil-may-care. Sabre-slashes scarred his white face from his high cheekbones to his strong, wide mouth.

Captain Ulrich von der Lanz bowed stiffly. "Hohenlohe and I attend your Majesty, he said formally.

Very nice of you, I am sure, murmured the King. He looked at the pleasant, smiling face of Count Joachim von Hohenlohe.

Joachim, he said, you know one of my most ardent wishes is to get away from the Palace as much as possible, and yet when I enter my humble home I find an earnest uniformed tramp blocking my pathway. Shaking his head, he continued: I am stuffed as a Christian goose.

Your Majesty has dined well? asked Hohenlohe, smiling.

Far too well, sighed the King. Par too well, about twenty courses, I should think. I lost count after the first dozen. You know what those burgomasters' dinners are, just a snack of goose with red cabbage, rack of venison, bear steaks, boars' heads, Apfel Strudel, Linze, Torten. . . . But what am I to do? If I don't eat their food I insult them. If I do eat indigestion to sleep. That happy condition I don't dare attain at the banquet table, but I do permit myself a state which mildly stupefies me during the speeches after dinner. My own I always read in a coma, and I am firmly convinced no one listens anyway. Why should they? The King yawned. I am bored to utter distraction. I wonder what will happen next?

Outside the gates, under the walls, Sentry Number Three trod his beat with lithe precision. Down the street, beyond the rays of the lamp, three figures moved. A whisper passed.

Quick, now! A small man put his foot in the interlocked hands of a companion and, swinging himself up against the wall, was shoving from below. With quick, eager hands he grabbed the wide wall top and, drawing himself up, in a flash he dropped on the other side into the Palace garden. Whirling, the sentry challenged.

Halt! Who goes there?

Two citizens of Konigsburg, grumbled a voice.

I could have sworn, muttered the sentry, I heard the footsteps of three men.

Drink less Schnapps, mocked the voice, and you will stop hearing and seeing things.

Keep a civil tongue in your head, said the sentry sharply.

Serville, you mean, growled the speaker.

His companion touched his arm, quiet, comrade, he said soothingly. We have more important work at hand than baiting soldiers. Silently they walked down the street, the sentry's eyes upon them. On the other side of the Palace wall a silent form was speeding over the straw-covered flower-bed of the gardens, racing

If nobody has left you an income—

Why not take steps now to provide one, Miss Business Woman? It can be done.

Making a purchase and paying for it by instalments out of income, instead of by cash in one lump sum, is a matter familiar to the business woman of today. That is how many persons buy a car, fur coat, or house furnishings.

And no more complicated than that is the business of securing a regular income for yourself to begin later in life at a time when you plan to give up work.

Imagine yourself with a monthly income cheque received regularly at your door from the postman—leisure to travel, entertain and enjoy your friends and hobbies. Isn't it worth making an effort to reach that happy state of financial independence and security?

No medical examination is required in connection with some forms of retirement income policies. Have a talk with an Imperial Life representative soon.

Cheap Imported Radio Hazards Life, Property

TESTS SHOW THEY LACK ORDINARY SAFEGUARDS AGAINST SHOCK AND FIRE

Experts Warn Users—Not Only Menace, But Definitely Against Law, Say Authorities

You'd probably be horrified if someone said you held your life and property so cheaply that you would hazard it for a few dollars, wouldn't you?

Yet, according to electrical authorities, that is exactly what you are doing if you are one of those persons who has imported a cheap, midget radio. The very cheapness of these radios is evidence of the fact that they constitute definite fire and shock hazards, authorities state, because radios simply cannot be made in accordance with safety requirements and still be sold at less than the prices asked for Canadian standard licensed receivers. Something must be left out, and investigation shows that, in the case of these very cheap midget radios the saving is accomplished by leaving off simple safeguards that protect you from shock and your home from fire.

Actually, to own one of these radios, that is, radio that does not incorporate simple safety devices as required by the Canadian Electrical Code, is an offence under the Code and people operating such a receiver are liable, for their own good, to be prosecuted. Canadian manufacturers, of course, are not permitted by the Code to produce substandard sets, nor are dealers allowed to sell them. Realizing the danger of substandard equipment, these manufacturers and retailers, naturally, are only too eager to comply with the requirements of the Code.

WARNINGS ISSUED!

However, substandard sets are sometimes brought into this country in blissful ignorance of possible consequences, and are being used, despite the fact that warnings have been issued regularly and despite the fact that there are actual cases on record where sudden, violent death has been the penalty for operating such sets. Bad burns and domestic fires have also been reported as a result of using these unprotected sets. Fire resulting from the use of substandard equipment, it is stated, voids most fire insurance policies also because it is contended that the fire is due to the carelessness of the owner, it is assumed to know the fire hazard which one of these sets creates.

Carrying the torch for the protection of your life property against the hazards of these substandard sets is Canadian Radio Patents, Limited, or Toronto. This company, owning the rights on essential and basic patents, insists that all radios manufactured under its licenses, which means, virtually, all radios manufactured in Canada, comply in every respect with safety codes. This is a matter of simple business with Canadian Radio Patents, Limited, because after all, it is naturally only good business for this company to require its licensees to manufacture the best products possible under its patents. Persons infringing on these patents by operating unlicensed radios of course, are liable to legal action for the recovery of damages as would be anyone who infringed on a Canadian patent.

NOT SO CHEAP!

So, if you are considering the purchase and importation of a cheap radio, think well before you do so. The savings you may realize, even though they may sound tempting, are too high a price to pay for placing in jeopardy your life and the lives of your children, not to mention your property. Then, too, you are definitely breaking the law in respect to the Electrical Code; equally you are infringing on the Patent rights held by Canadian Radio Patents, Limited, with the attendant liability for infringement.

All in all, then, the cheapness of those cheap midget sets you hear about doesn't offer such an appealing bargain, after all, does it? Don't forget either that reception is anything but satisfactory, too, because when they make radios so cheaply they have to leave off a lot of other parts as well, as ordinary safeguards. Some of those parts are important to your enjoyment of radio, you can be sure!

DIGNITY IN LIVINGROOM

The housewife who wants her living room to radiate hospitality while it maintains an air of dignity may well choose panelled walls as a background for the furnishings. A room that has become tiresome will take on new life with panelled walls. One housewife decided on this means of bringing the interior of her house up to modern fashion. She did not feel that the expense of making structural changes to the house was justified, so concentrated her efforts on the room in which the family spent most of its time. The wall panels used were in an interesting design. The wood was not of a uniform size and the irregularly kept the room from too formal an atmosphere. Over the mantel small squares of the paneling formed a design, obviating the necessity of any wall decoration. Chinese tiles were used in the fireplace, striking a note of colour against the sombre background of the wood. The floor was refinished, and leaded windows replaced the regulation ones which had formerly graced the room.

When the transformation of the room had been completed, the owner had her chintz covers made for the furniture and matching drapes hung. The entire character of the room was changed and the family had an individual room which stood out from others of the neighbourhood.
