NEW YORK.—There are only 11 delegates on the half-moon edge of the United Nations Security Council's big table. They sit there a few hours each day, trying to eliminate the causes of war. But behind them are more than a thousand men and women, without whom the Council could not function—and eventually that figure may be nearly tripled.

The payroll of Secretary-General Trygve Lie's working staff in New York alone numbers 650, not counting 50 experts and specialists who are on loan from various member governments. These range from about a hundred laborers, janitors, chauffeurs and the like to economists, statisticians, department heads.

Along the way there are clerks, stenographers, and public relations personnel allocated to press and radio, to still photographers and newswriters; there are highly skilled men and women selected for their ability to record verbatim, without error, anything that may be said on the floor in any language.

INTERPRETERS

There are stenographers and typists who must be capable of intelligent work at least in two languages, and there are interpreters who can listen to a long, involved, highly technical speech, make longhand notes during its course, and at its end rattle off an accurate translation from Russian or Chinese or Spanish into French and English.

The pressure under which these interpreters work has been emphasized on occasions when they were translating Ambassador Andre Gromyko's laiz. The Russian speaks only his native language in Council sessions. It must then be interpreted into both French and English. Once or twice the diplomat, apparently listening only casually to the interpretation, has caught errors that might have implicated him more deeply than he intended. On such occasions he has appreciated the exact nuance of the interpretation and has interrupted with corrections, using English much superior to that of some delegates who use our language on the floor. During the first debate on Iran he corrected the interpreter's "agreements" to "understandings."

But even these more than 800 who work under the general direction of the Secretary-General constitute only part of the staff that surrounds the Big Eleven who make the headlines.

Each delegate has his own personal staff. American Delegate Edward Rostow's numbers 40, plus Secretary of State James F. Byrnes on occasion. British Delegate Alexander Cadogan has 10, Cromarty 12, French Ambassador Henri Bonnet 10, Chinese Delegate Quo Tai-chi five. Most of the rest average about ten members, except Polish Delegate Oscar Lange, who has only four.

In a midtown Manhattan hotel the Military Section meets in deep secrecy to decide on the form, size and use of the proposed U.N. world army. There the United States and Great Britain have about 30 officials and workers each, most of the time; France 12, Russia 11, China 10.

Concessionaire Joseph Barnes, who feeds around 1500 persons every noon, another 1000 or more at odd hours and in the evening, and maintains three bars for delegates, press and the public, has five cooks, about 70 other cafeteria employees, and two or three tenders at each bar.

ing to be moved across the Atlantic in time for its scheduled May meeting in New York.

The trusteeship program has not yet been developed, and the Atomic Energy Commission is still to be activated. The Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization is still in the preparatory stage.

Add the "permanent" staff under Lie, whose members still are on a basis of temporary employment; the borrowed experts; the delegates' personal staffs; the Hunter College maintenance staff; the cafeteria workers; the U. S. Marines and the New York City policemen, and you will find that even now in New York alone, the spotlighted delegates are outnumbered about 100 to 1 by the unglamorous workers upon whom they depend.

Nor does this take account of some 500 newspaper reporters and photographers, radio and television and newsreel staffs, assigned to give that publicity which is the only weapon possessed by the United Nations to hold any of the Big Five in line. And it ignores perhaps a hundred telephone telegraph, cable and wireless employees required to handle that publicity plus the United Nations' own huge message file.

Eventually, when all the organization's bureaus get to functioning fully, a spokesman for the executive office estimates that there will be some 2500 persons on the U.N.'s own payroll. In New York or wherever it may be functioning by that time.
