Bristol And Vicinity

Mr. Vincent Lund, Tracadie, spent the weekend in Bristol.

The illness of Mrs. Stannis Lapierre at her home here is deeply regrettable.

Miss Alice, McCarthy, Teacher at Bristol School, was a visitor to the city on Saturday on business.

The condition of Mrs. P. J. Hughes remains unchanged at time of writing and she is confined to bed.

Mr. J. B. Jay, special agent for the Imperial Late Assurance Co., spent the weekend at his home in Morell.

The weekly study club meeting was held at the home of Mr. John T. O'Brien, on Friday, with a full attendance of members.

Mr. Harris Arnold Jr., has entered the wood sawing business this year with a new and up to date outfit and at present is quite busy.

Pte Fred Mosher, of the Highlanders is visiting his home here for a few days for the first time since leaving the Island last fall.

Mr. Anlem Lapierre, who was head cook at the Savage Harbor packing plant last spring will take up the position again this spring it is understood.

Mrs. B. W. McEwen, Morell, left on Friday morning for Montreal to visit her daughter Jean who is a nurse in training at Royal Victoria Hospital there.

A large crowd of hockey followers lined the Morell rink Friday night to see Savage Harbor and Morell, battle to a three-three tie in a last clean game of hockey.

Mr. Leonard Ryan, Morell Rear, is supplying some of the Morell residents with a quantity of hardwood in large blocks for furnace use. It seems to be cheaper than the black diamond.

The roads in this district are the best winter roads in years even on the paved road that is ploughed, there is a wonderful road for sleds and sledges and very busy hauling wood and lumber.

The first debate of the season was held at Morell last week, the subject being who gets the most pleasure in life—the traveller or the reader. After a stiff talk from both sides the judges gave their decision in favor of the traveller.

What is known as a measuring party was held at the home of Ruben Drake, last week. Some of the tall folks had to pay pretty high to attend as the fee was so much per inch of your height. Songs, games, fun and laughter with a fine lunch were the features of the evening.

Mr. Irving Drake, has returned from an extended visit to Boston and other parts of the States. Mr. Drake, spent several weeks with his brother Jim, in Somerville, Mass., who runs an up to date restaurant there. Mr. Drake says after his trip the bigger cities there is no place so cozy as the Island.

Your writer is informed that the Rev. Reginald McDonald, Parish Priest at Indian River, will join the Canadian Army very shortly as an army chaplain. Fr. McDonald is a native of this district. His father, Jas. B. McDonald, is a former member of the Provincial Government under the Conservative term but has retired from the field.

Mr. Gerald Barry, who has been foreman for Mr. Cox at St. Peter's Harbor for nineteen years, will take over the running of the new plant at the harbor this spring run by the Fishermen's Union on a co-operative basis. Some of the sturdy fishermen will be missing from the breakwater this spring as many of our best fishers have answered the call to the colors.

A cattle buyer who was in this district on Saturday had very poor success as most of the beef cattle were sold early in the fall.

be played for at next meeting. The National Anthem, the singing of the national flag, the singing of the national anthem and a delicious lunch was served by the hostess, and the remainder of the evening pleasantly spent in social entertainment.

Miss Theresa Donahue, Rosemeath, was in the City on Saturday.

Fundamentals Of Silver Fox Breeding

(By G. Ennis Smith, Animal Geneticist and Superintendent, Dominion Experimental Fox Ranch, Summerside)

It might be advisable to say a few words regarding fundamentals so that the average reader may get a clear conception and follow more intelligently the contents of this article. Fundamentals deal solely with facts and are brief statements conveying a consistent mode of behavior. There is a profound consistency with regard to the so-called laws of nature. It is commonly known that a brick has a consistent tendency to fall to the ground, a constant mode of behavior and a manifestation of the so-called law of gravitation. Also it is commonly known that water runs down hill, another constant mode of behavior. But all the water that has run over Niagara Falls has to a greater extent travelled upwards into the skies, but in such contrary manner that it is still a constant mode of behavior with respect to water in the liquid state and in the state of vapor.

Perhaps the most remarkable feature of our presentational work has been the consistency of the results. When all the facts have been considered it has become apparent that there has been a constant mode of behavior. Therefore, foxes produce offspring on the one hand superior to themselves, or on the other hand inferior, the final analysis has shown a remarkable consistency of the conditions. For very good reasons, I would like to definitely understand that I am dealing solely with facts and first hand information obtained in our experimental work. I would be loath to peddle second hand information with respect to the breeding experience with plans and other animals even though they were brought forward by well recognized authorities unless it had been established that it held true with respect to silver foxes.

Inbreeding and Outcrossing

Our experimental work has definitely demonstrated the necessity of inbreeding and outcrossing, which must be carried out in a methodical manner. There is a definite time to outcross and a definite time to inbreed. It is very important to understand the fundamentals of silver fox breeding is to inbreed with outcrossed foxes and outcross with inbred foxes, but to carry that out in an intelligent manner. There must be a clear understanding of what can be gained by outcrossing on the one hand and inbreeding on the other, and what is more important still is a greater increase with respect to density in each of the methods of breeding. In this respect there has been a constant mode of behavior in our experimental work.

Outcrossing with inbred foxes has led to the following definite improvements:—

- (1) An increase in size, particularly in girth.
- (2) Increase in volume of underfur.
- (3) Increase in density or strength of the guard hairs.
- (4) Increase in the body area of the silver phase.
- (5) A more intense pigmentation.

While there has been a remarkable consistency with respect to the increase in the strength or density of the fur in litters, the products of outcrossing there has never been a uniformity. In the same litter there has often been a greater increase with respect to strength with some, whilst with others there is a greater increase with respect to density. That is, with outcrossing an increase in density or strength of fur should be obtained.

In some cases there may be an increase in both, while in others there may be an increase in the density of the fur without any increase in the strength. In still other cases there may be an increase in the strength of the fur with very little increase in the density.

The following unfavorable conditions have invariably been associated with outcrossing and have been more intense according to the degree of the outcrossing:—

- (1) Coarseness of fur, unfavorable texture susceptible to weather conditions.
- (2) Woolly condition of the underfur, susceptible to dirt.
- (3) Lack of silver character.
- (4) A susceptibility to go off colour and acquire a very pronounced brown shade.

The products of outcrossing, when kept in open pens, have invariably acquired a very pronounced brown shade, while foxes, the product of inbreeding, fed and ranched under the same conditions, have maintained a clear black colour. But when both of these classes of foxes have been kept under cover the products of outcrossing have developed a very intense and a more favourable black colour. With favourable outcrossing there should

Favorable Results

The favourable results obtained by inbreeding have been as follows:—

- (1) A clearer black colour not so susceptible to environments and which has not acquired a brown shade when ranched in open pens.
- (2) A smoother cuticle of the guard hairs, which has maintained a favorable texture when kept in open pens.
- (3) A silkier texture of the underfur.
- (4) An improvement in the character of the silver phase.
- (5) A clearer silver colour.

The unfavorable results by successive generations of inbreeding have been as follows:—

- (1) Decrease in size, particularly in girth.
- (2) Loss in density of the fur, the fur becoming open, in some cases feathery.
- (3) A marked decrease in the area of the silver phase; continued inbreeding killing the silver.
- (4) Decrease in the volume of underfur leading to pronounced flatness.

It is very important that fox breeders should keep clearly in mind the fundamental facts with regard to inbreeding and outcrossing when they are making up their mating schedule. Obviously it would be a fatal policy to inbreed with open fur foxes of low girth or that lacked size in other respects. It is essential that foxes used for inbreeding should be large with a good girth and very dense fur. When foxes lack size and are open fur they are already on the way to the scrap. Inbreeding will only lead to a still more pronounced drop, to a worse condition still with respect to size, density of fur, etc., etc.

Length and Girth

Fox breeders are not running much risk by inbreeding as long as the can maintain length and girth, strength and density of the fur. But inbreeding leads not only to a decrease in the size of the animal and density of the fur, but more often to a softness in the fur and a loss in the silver character. Obviously, if fox breeders have any desirable animals inclined to be open fur or lack size, the only sensible procedure is to carry out some sensible method of outcrossing with all such foxes. On the other hand, if the foxes should be coarse furred with woolly underfur and have both size and density of fur, there is an advantage what-ever in outcrossing as it will exaggerate the unfavorable conditions that already exist; with these foxes inbreeding is the only feasible procedure. So that outcrossing and inbreeding should be governed by the individual type of the foxes.

Successive generations of outcrossing have led to exactly the same results as successive generations of inbreeding, loss of size, density of fur, and of the silver character. Hybrid vigor gained by outcrossing can only be obtained in the first outcrossing and by repeated outcrossing what has been gained by the first outcross is entirely lost. What is more important still in order to get the full benefits of the hybrid vigor obtained from outcrossing, the outcross should be carried out with foxes from a father and daughter, mother and son, or brother and sister mating. An outcross should be made with inbred foxes and the more closely the foxes are inbred that are used for the outcross the more advantage will be obtained by outcrossing. Throughout the silver fox industry fox breeders have not taken the advantage of the favorable results that have been obtained by outcrossing because they have not first preceded the outcross with a sufficiently intense form of inbreeding.

Small Foxes

At the present time there is a wholesale production of small foxes
