THURSDAY, JANUARY 9, 1913. COMPARATIVELY UNKNOWN.

While newspaper readers, the world over, are familiar with every phase, real and imaginary, of the German menace, probably not one in a million of them has ever heard of "The Associated Councils of the Churches of the British and German Empire, for Fostering Friendly Relations Between the Two Peoples." Yet this society has as real an existence as has the Imperial or the Canadian parliaments, and it includes in its membership men who, for intelligence, patriotism and statesmanship, are the equals of any men in either of these august bodies. Moreover, making every allowance for newspaper and other political noises, this society wields as great an influence as either or both of the august bodies referred to.

The British branch of these councils has for president the Archbishop of Canterbury and among its vice-presidents are the Archbishop of York, Lord Bishop of the Scottish Episcopal Church, the Lord Primate of Ireland, the Duke of Argyll, Sir Oliver Lodge and some 248 other leaders in church and public life in Britain. The German branch includes names equally illustrious though possibly less familiar to our readers.

A conference was held in London at the end of October and beginning of November, for the purpose of considering how relations between Britain and Germany could be improved under the auspices of these two branches of the Associated Councils. It was one of the most important gatherings ever held in the world's greatest city. Still, so far as we know, not a word was said in regard to this conference in news which came by cable from London at the time. At the same time the cable was being burdened with the clamor for war which was being raised by Lord Roberts, Lord Charles Beresford and the many others whose utterances on the war and the necessity for preparation are so familiar to newspaper readers in Canada. The incident goes to show what a distorted view those are given of really important matters who depend upon the cable for the news of old world events.

The value of the conference can hardly be overestimated; for, while its deliberations received apparently no mention in cable despatches coming to America, reports of the proceedings were published in all the important newspapers in Great Britain and Germany, and were widely discussed in both countries. The King showed his personal interest in the conference by inviting the delegates from Germany to spend an afternoon at Windsor, where they were received with every possible kindness.

The Lord Mayor of London, in opening the conference said many notable things. "What is war for?" he asked. "If men would only stop to ask themselves that question—what for?"

The reasons for misunderstanding between Great Britain and Germany, he added, were really very slight, and he was of opinion that no great divergence would ever occur between the two great countries owing to racial bonds uniting them. When he travelled through Germany he could not help noticing that the Germans and English are obviously of the same race. Tenderly and deeply as the Germans thought of the fatherland, was it not possible that they might think in the same way of the "cousinland"? It was impossible for him to believe that Englishmen could ever come face to face with arms of destruction in their hands, in a war against their own brothers, or at all events a war against their own cousins.

Among the papers read at this conference were two, one by Sir Charles McCara of Great Britain, the other by Dr. Karl Rathger of Germany, two of the greatest authorities on international trade.

These two dealt with commercial interests and were designed to show that for their prosperity these two countries depend on each other, that growth of the other and that in the loom of commerce the threads of Anglo German trade are so closely intertwined that the blow that injures one must also destroy the other. The trend of the whole discussion was that apart even from the crime and the inhumanity of a war between these two countries nothing could be more disastrous to both.

For political purposes, emphasis is being placed upon a menace which is largely imaginary, while the forces which tend to minimize that menace are entirely ignored.

Miss S. L. Tarr

Miss S. L. Tarr sprang into national fame last October when she took Governor Wilson's 6,000 word speech, after office hours, and turned into it the next morning at 10 o'clock a transcript that was so perfect that but few changes were necessary. Miss Tarr writes Gregg shorthand the system that is taught at the Union Commercial College under the personal direction of P. H. Moran, an instructor of 16 years experience.

Fennell & Chandler Victoria Row

The figures quoted above one would naturally think they were now able to shift for themselves. This, it appears, is not so. They are looking for extra bonuses.

During the past sixteen years the Dominion Government has paid out in bounties on the manufacture of steel and iron $16,619,077. According to these figures, says "The Saturday Night," every time the mills turned out one ton of pig iron we, the intelligent voter, approached hat in hand and handed over $1.25 just to encourage the manufacturers to keep busy. Every time he turned out a ton of steel we knelt and handed out just a little short of $1.50. When he made a ton of puddled iron bars we were so affected that we stood on our heads and let $3.00 drop out of our pockets and when he made a ton of steel manufactures we burst into tears and begged him to accept $5 and some cents and to keep the change. This, besides the other special privilege of duties against imports from other countries and of municipal aid and freedom from taxation.

Within the past few weeks these infant industries have renewed their importunities for extra bonuses. They are asking for an enquiry with a view to proving to the intelligent electors how much they need further assistance. Of course everything will depend upon who makes the enquiry but it will take a lot of figuring and manoeuvring to persuade the electors aforesaid that further assistance is needed.

FOR GENERAL BENEFIT.

Sir:—Now, as the fifth annual poultry show has passed, and the people in general have been discussing poultry and poultry shows, and while it is fresh in our memories, we should ask ourselves—are we making progress in this great industry?

Five years ago when this poultry association started we had with us a number of farmers, but today I am sorry to say, I find only one farmer who is a member competing in the open class. And had it not been for the wise provision of the present government in giving them a utility class they would be entirely pushed out, as the fancy poultry is not suitable for his purpose.

Hens today are bred for special purpose, and the means employed in each case are entirely different. If you are after an egg yield trap nests should be employed, and with close observation we find the profitable hen. To stimulate this yield we have the egg contests which are being held in all parts of the world. This is only one side of the utility class. We have the fowl bred for table qualities, which are as different as the dairy cow is from the beef cow. In one case, no matter how well fed, the food goes to produce milk, and in the other case to produce beef. This same rule applies to fowls.

Next in importance we have the standard bred or fancy fowls, which might be divided into a great many classes. But I will divide it into two, solid and parti-colored. The latter require two separate matings, one for cockerel, and the other to produce pullets of required standard color, and they also require to be line bred or inbred to make a success of fancy fowls. So you see that the means adopted for each are entirely different and with a different aim in view. My reason for writing this is that the farmer may not be deceived by mixing up these different classes to the ruin of his stock, as so many of late are doing. Buying purely fancy stock thinking to improve their laying and table qualities, whereas the contrary has been the result. I know of several who have ruined their stock in this way. Yours, L. A. HASZARD, Charlottetown.

Young Man, Now Is The Time To Insure

The proper time to insure is now, when you are young, for responsibility rests easily on your shoulders and your obligations are few and light. The premium cost of an insurance policy is at its lowest point and the cost of insurance will never be lower.

And by insuring now you are sure to have a good sized nest-egg stored up for use at middle age—just when you need it and it will prove most valuable. A young man has everything to gain and nothing to lose by insurance.
