HELIGOLAND COMPARED TO GIBRALTER

The island of Heligoland (near which the British fleet sank a German submarine) is called the Gibraltar of the North Sea. It dominates the approaches to all German ports and in case of war the Kiel Canal and constitutes the greatest menace to the British fleet as it attempts a close blockade of German ports. It was ceded to Germany by England as recently as 1890, in compensation for territorial concessions in Africa by Germany.

Discussion of the strategic value of the little island less than a square mile in extent which lies 25 miles off the mouth of the Elbe, waged back and forth between the English military authorities while the Bill for its cession was under discussion in Parliament. Some asserted that it would be worth a fleet to England in case of war with Germany. Others contended it was of no value as a coaling station for a blocking force. Its nearness to the mainland would expose it to the risk of capture immediately upon declaration of war with any other power it would require a fleet to defend it. German and French critics both agreed that in the event of war between their countries possession of the little island would set free an army corps.

Was Republic Once.

Heligoland from the middle of the 10th century was an independent republic of Frisians, but became the possession of the Dukes of Schleswig in the 14th century. In the beginning of the 18th century Denmark captured it. It was taken from Denmark by the English, who retained it during the late Napoleonic wars as a storehouse from which to smuggle goods to the continent. By the Treaty of Kiel it was ceded to England by Denmark in 1814. The British government wished to retain it because of its proximity to Hanover, then united to England in the person of the sovereign, and because of its supposed strategic value. Up to the time of its cession to Germany it was used as the headquarters of the English fishing fleets in the North Sea and was also a favorite watering place for Germans and Danes.

After the formation of the German Empire Bismarck made many liberal offers to England for the purchase of the island, and the desire for its possession by the Germans was ardent. When the Bill for its cession came up in 1890 the British Government, Mr. Gladstone and Sir W. Vernon Harcourt, with many of their followers, refused to vote, declaring that the Conservative Ministry had tampered with the constitution and abandoned the Treaty making prerogative of the Crown by submitting the question of a cession of territory to two Houses of Parliament.

The weight which the Germans attached at the time to the acquisition of Heligoland, and, after Prince Bismarck had repeatedly made offers of substantial compensation, suggested the suspicion when the island was handed over to William II, after the dismissal of the old chancellor for apparently inadequate cause, that some secret pact of alliance was at the root of the matter. The British subjects on the island opposed the transfer, saying that they would lose their fishing and bathing privileges when Germany started building their fortifications on their home. Their rights as British subjects were to have been preserved in the transaction.

On August 3, 1890, the British Government, Arthur C. B. Baskly, received the German representative, Herr von Lotzcher, and the next day Kaiser Wilhelm landed, hoisted the German flag and formally took possession, declaring:

"This island is chosen as a bulwark of the sea, a protection to German fisheries, a central point for my ships of war, and a strong place and harbor of refuge in the German ocean against all enemies who dare to show themselves upon it."
