RENA MADELINE MacINNIS

The death occurred in the Charlottetown Hospital on Monday, June 12, of Rena Madeline Macinnis, youngest daughter of William and the late Mrs. Macinnis of Borden at the age of twelve years. Two weeks ago she had entered the City Hospital and underwent an operation for mastitis. Later another operation was found to be necessary but although tenderly cared for and given best medical skill her gentle spirit passed away on Monday morning.

She was a quiet affectionate child who thought it a pleasure to help others and her gentle manners and kindly ways will be missed not only in the home but among her many friends and schoolmates.

Funeral service was held in Sacred Heart Church at Borden on Wednesday morning, Requiem Mass being sung by Rev. W. MacDonald who also officiated at the grave. The funeral procession consisted of the mourners, Girl Guides and nearly a hundred school children. The pallbearers were Walter Dorsey, George Jay, Albert Jay, Bonnie Howatt, Walter Westhaver, and Philip Howatt. Interment was in the cemetery at Seven Mile Bay.

Besides a sorrowful father and step-mother there are left to mourn six sisters, Margaret, Mrs. Emile Gallant, Charlottetown; Lou, Mrs. Lell Erickson, Sydney; Alice, Mrs. Fred Jeffrey, Sydney; N.S.; Anna, Mrs. William Hurlford, Sydney; P.E.; Katherine Macinnis, C.W.A.C. Ottawa; and Phyllis of Halifax; also three brothers, Charles of Borden; driver Harry Macinnis, C.A.S.C. Ottawa; and Leland at home. To all of these the sincere sympathy of the community of Borden is extended.

The Man Who Wasn't Himself

By Leslie Cargill

"You'd better not have poked your nose in," he snarled. "I'm none too sure of Thomas; after this, he wasn't going to tell me you'd been snooping."

"You did, did you?" Well, seeing you've gone so far, I'm taking care you go the whole way. Turn up in the morning and lend a hand with the shipment."

"I'll see you frizzling first."

"Not so fast. I'm taking you see with me to the bank. You've got your nose in my pocket if you step off the path. Out of sight you're a nuisance."

"Wait and see."

An open jack-knife was a potent argument. It induced Barkness to do "As I foretold, you are likely to end up with murder," he pointed out.

"Murray snarled. "A knife can do a heap of harm without actually killing," he retorted. "Start something if you want a lesson."

"This isn't the first time you've played with cold steel."

"No fear! I'm an expert, especially in carrying up peevy countenances. You'd never look so handsome again after I'd operated on you."

Barkness was almost amused at the irony of it, after what he had undergone at the hands of Dr. MacFarlane. In a way it made him less afraid to know that it was possible to repair such ravages. Perhaps if he struggled and the knife sank deeply into his muscles the same surgeon would be able to give him back his original features.

The idea interested him. Yet he sank from the tearing pain that Black Jack threatened. Besides, it would upset all his plans if he were laid up at this stage.

"You're sold away," he said quietly. "I'll do it for you."

Joyce Barlow was angry. In her view, sharing a secret was a matter to bring two people closer.

together. Even since Richard Barkness had unburdened himself, she had seen less of him than ever. Figue mingled with concern, compelling her to take him to task. "You're treating me unfairly, Perry," she said. "I suppose I must continue to call you Perry?" "Please!" "Must you act like a Trooplet snout?" He chuckled. "Far from it." "Anyway, you haven't had much to say to me."

"Big business, young woman. I have been engaged in receiving and disposing of a very considerable amount of stolen property."

"Black Murrey again?" "Hoodlum to say. It was either taking it on or being carved up with a sharp implement."

"Do you dare stand there and admit you hadn't the nerve to resist?"

"Only partly. I happen to be on the track of something which I hope will clear up the old booby and couldn't afford to fall out with Murrey. At a pinch I would have screwed my courage and risked the knife."

"She breathed a sigh of relief. "I don't take you for a coward, but when you talk about what you can't afford to do, you think you can afford to get yourself into the hands of the police as one of Murrey's gang?"

"I think I know how it strikes you, my dear, but I must run with the police for a while. That's absolutely unavoidable. For the rest, Murrey has handed me $200 as my share of the loot, but that has been put on one side for refunding at an appropriate time."

"What did he get out of it?"

"Richard Barkness is a superior man. Cooper, also had a roundish sum."

"You're more interested in him than in Murrey, aren't you?"

"Neither. He belongs to my stable past, not to my temporary present. Besides, I'm depending on getting to the truth of that dirty trick he played on me."

"All right," she sighed. "I'll try not to get in the way again."

"Steady, Joyce," he said anxiously. "You mustn't talk like that. You aware I've met you?"

"I have no special claims on your time."

"No. When you put it like that—Richard Barkness is a comparatively stranger to me."

"I know that, too."

"Nevertheless, Perry, Chetwood was a different proposition. He suggested to be in love with me."

"I'm sorry."

Her face was beating impudently on the floor, but he talked to her. "There is nothing to apologise for," she said coldly.

"But I am being treated you unfairly. We do hold something in common."

"Do we?"

"An interest in Chetwood. I have acquired his appearance and reputation while you—"

"Joyce decided to help him out. "Well," he continued lazily. "he had a cover in your life too."

Her seeming indifference chilled him. He hesitated, and the opportunity for arriving at an understanding of her he wished devoutly, she could only sigh despairingly.

Every time he saw her, his affection strengthened. Whenever he thought of her he wished devoutly that their paths had crossed in his earlier existence. It seemed impossible that he should begin where Chetwood left off, relying on the advantages of an earlier friendship and bringing to it qualities that the girl admitted admiring.
