Commander Walter M. Schirra, left, and Air Force Major Thomas P. Stafford are seen Monday as they listen to a question that was being put to them by newsmen after they were named as the crew for the fourth manned Gemini flight late this year or early next year. The flight will include docking up the Gemini spacecraft with an Agena vehicle it is orbiting the earth. (AP Wirephoto)

Canadian Regulations May Spark Retaliation

By KEN SMITH
Canadian Press Business Editor TORONTO (CP) — Canada may find itself facing retaliatory measures from some of its best overseas customers unless it pays more attention to their long-standing grievances about getting access to the Canadian market, Murray Corlett, counsel for the Canadian Importers Association, said Tuesday. He told the association's annual meeting that one of the most troublesome complaints about Canada's customs regulations is its "automatic dumping duty" which is applied to imported goods if the selling price of the goods is less than the value for duty. Other trading countries, except New Zealand, require domestic manufacturers to prove that the imported goods could harm their business before dumping duty is applied. Mr. Corlett said Britain has long complained about this regulation, in effect since 1904. "I do not think that it is unreasonable to assume that the U.K. authorities will not sit back forever and not take the necessary corrective measures."

Mr. Corlett asked whether the plan will result in sufficiently lower costs for the consumer to compensate for the duty revenues lost to the national treasury, and also whether Canadian car makers could not afford to pass along at least some of their tax savings. He said he would not be surprised if, after the pact is discussed in Parliament, "the Canadian auto manufacturers who are the only beneficiaries under the new plan decided to make immediate partial price concessions at least." The pact, signed by Prime Minister Pearson and President Johnson last January but still awaiting U.S. congressional approval, already is under attack by several GATT members, Mr. Corlett said. This pressure, as well as domestic factors, could result in the U.S. Congress passing a bill that was substantially different from the one envisaged last January. STILL STEAMS ALONG The Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Company is the oldest and largest shipping complex in the world, founded in 1837 and now with more than 300 ships.

ured products entering the British market." Mr. Corlett said Canadian manufacturers have favored retaining the automatic dumping rule because of the threat of competition from end-of-the-run goods from the U.S., which could be sold for little more than manufacturing costs, and because of the difficulty of proving injury before business is hurt. "Of course," he said, "in all likelihood domestic manufacturers in the other countries that have adopted the GATT (General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade) principle of dumping (which has no automatic provision) had the same fears at one time."

He criticized the recent auto-trade agreement between Canada and the U.S. as being a hasty plan put together to replace the tariff-rebate program that had been attacked by U.S. auto parts makers. NOT FREE TRADE "It would appear as if the new plan more nearly represents a form of tariff protection for the benefit of a handful of Canadian auto manufacturers than a genuine free-trade arrangement."
