Gaining the security of a ridge, Stephen felt more secure. The sweat on his face told of the energy it had cost him in that climb, but almost immediately he realized how worth-while it had been. On the still air he caught the sound of voices, and they were voices not difficult to recognize.
Slowly he crawled on hands and knees through the scrub until, parting the thick, sappy branches in front of his face he found himself looking down on to the side of a slight eminence, with here and there a solitary palm standing out from it at an absurd angle, casting its shadow not at the foot of the trunk as it would have done had it been completely vertical, but at some distance away from the down the slope, while beneath the shade thus afforded sat Claude Greatrix and Lady Kitty.
Stephen lay watching. There was something about the pair that savoured of conspiracy. What gave him that impression he did not know just then, but when Greatrix spoke again, that impression was not only intensified, it was confirmed.

MYSTERIOUS BLACK BOX
Claude Greatrix did not speak immediately. It appeared as if, having worked up to this desirable climax after a period of intensive cultivation of Lady Pointer's confidence, he was in some doubt as to whether she would be as easy of manipulation as she seemed to be. West did not often that Greatrix found himself at fault in the assessment of character and in the woman who was before him now he had imagined that even if only for the sake of contrariness she would do precisely as he bade her.
"You'll probably think me a criminal when I tell you what I want you to do," he smiled easily and disarmingly. "Nevertheless it is something that you, and you alone can do. But tell me, have you ever noticed that wherever Sir Timothy goes he always takes along with him a small black box?" Lady Kitty nodded. "Why, yes," she told him quickly. "He keeps it in a little safe in his cabin." Lady Kitty's eyes held more than a suggestion of surprise at Greatrix's question.
