But it suited Marzak not at all that the matter should be thus dismissed, that it should conclude upon a note of weakness from his father, upon what indeed amounted to a speech of reconciliation. Before Sak-el-Bahr could make answer he had cut in to set him a question laden with wicked intent. "How will thy bride beguile the season of thine absence, O Sak-el-Bahr?" "I have lived too little with women to be able to give thee an answer," said the corsair.

Marzak winced before a reply that seemed to reflect upon himself. But he returned to the attack. "I compassionate thee that art the slave of duty, driven so soon to abandon the delight of her soft arms. Wherefore should a Moslem bestow his wife but according to the biddings of the Prophet—in the house?" Marzak sneered.

"Verily, I marvel at thy fortitude in quitting her so soon!" But Asad caught the sneer, and stared at his son. "What cause is there to marvel in that a true Moslem should sacrifice his inclinations to the service of the faith?"

His tone was a rebuke; but it left Marzak undismayed. The youth sprang with bounding corsair, who took their ease there until the time to engage should be upon them. They leaned on the high bulwarks or squatted in groups talking, laughing, some of them uttering and repairing garments, others brushing their weapons or their armor, and one swartly youth sang a melody which Shilba loved so, the delight of a score or so of blood-thirsty ruffians squatting about him in a ring of variegated color.

The gorgeous poop was fitted with a spacious cabin, to which admission was gained by two archways curtained with stout silken tapestries upon whose deep red ground the crescent was wrought in brilliant green. Above the cabin stood the three crescents or cupolas, great structures of gilded brass surmounted each by the orb and crescent. As if to continue the cabin lining was increased its size, a green awning was erected from it to shade the deck. Here, upon the poop, stood Sak-el-Bahr, watching Vignello and his men as they passed from beneath to beneath serving out biscuits and dried dates to the crews—sprawling, for oars move sluggishly when stomachs are too well nourished—and giving each to drink a cup of vinegar and water in which floated a few drops of added oil.

Then he pointed to a large palmetto balm that stood on the waistdeck near the mainmast about which the powder barrels were stacked. "That palmetto," he said, "seems to me oddly in the way yonder. Were it not better to bestow it in the hold, where it will cease to be an encumbrance in case of action?"

Sak-el-Bahr experienced a slight tightening at the heart. He knew that Marzak had heard him command that balm to be borne into the poop-cabin, and that anon he had ordered it to be fetched thence when Asad had announced his intention of sailing with him. He realized that this in itself might be a suspicious circumstance, rather, knowing what the balm contained he was too ready to fear suspicion. Nevertheless he turned to Marzak with a smile of some disdain. "I understood, Marzak, that thou art sailing with me as an apprentice."

"What then?" quoth Marzak. "Why merely that it might become better to be content to observe and learn. Thou'lt soon be telling me how grapeballs should be slung and how an action should be fought."

Then he pointed ahead to what seemed to be no more than a low cloud-bank toward which they were rapidly skimming before that friendly wind.

"Yonder," he said, "are the Eberlees. We are making good speed."

Although he said it without any object other than that of turning the conversation, yet the fact itself was sufficiently remarkable to be worth a comment. Whether roved by her two hundred fifty slaves or sailed under her enormous spread of canvas there was no swifter vessel upon the Mediterranean than the galasse of Sak-el-Bahr. Overboard she swept now with bellying ladders, her well grained keel slipping through the wind-whipped water at a rate which perhaps could not have been attained by any ship that sailed.

"If this wind holds we shall be under the Point of Agulha before sunset, which will be something to boast of hereafter," he promised.

Official endorsement of Senator La Follette's candidacy by the American Federation of Labor is considered the most important development of the campaign in the United States. In Moscow's opinion organized labor in America has broken definitely with its traditional support of the two party system.

"It can now be a question of a few years at the most until an American political faction, parallel to the British Labor party, leaps into the arena," an official said.

Russian politicians foresee the unification of heterogeneous American labor.

Russia Unmoved By U. S. Elections

(Special To The Guardian)

MOSCOW, Oct. 29.—Soviet Russia attaches small importance to the outcome of the American elections. A bored indifference is the attitude here.

The geographic remoteness of the United States accounts for much of the indifference. There is also universal ignorance of the issues.

In well informed circles, where American politics are understood, the indifference is calculated.
