WILD HORSES

By Henry Herbert Knibbs

CHAPTER XX
"When he who fled the wrath of man, a stranger to the land, Remed round and gazed toward Salvador, far miles across the sand, While Thirst and Madness waited still, hard-by on either hand."

In the rugged, wild, and untravelled country, far miles to the South of Solano—a country ridged with densely timbered hills and furrowed by deep and tortuous canons—Hartshorn, the outlaw and murderer, a victim of the elements, had been three days on foot trying to find his way to some known landmark. He climbed the brushy wall of a box canon into which he had strayed, and, realising that, if he did not arrive at some habitation soon, or chance upon some kind of wild game, he would starve to death, he deliberately set his face toward the north and trudged doggedly across the timbered crest of an unnamed range, heading, so far as he could approximate, toward the last habitation he had noticed when coming into the hills—the homestead of Johnny Trent. Three days behind him lay the rain-fattened ashes of a tiny camp-fire and the white and scattered splinters of a pine, shattered by the thunderbolt that set him afoot in the wilderness. Ever fearful of pursuit, he had made an early camp, allowed his horse to graze for an hour or so, and then he had saddled him and tied him to a low spruce beneath which he himself intended to sleep. When the mountain storm shook the earth with bolts that seemed to drive straight down, Hartshorn had watched the horse closely, fearing that he might stampede. The bolt that shattered the giant pine near the camp stunned Hartshorn for a moment. The horse reared back and broke the escape. Hartshorn heard him crash through the underbrush. With no chance of following the frightened animal, Hartshorn waited until daybreak and then trailed him to a mountain meadow several miles north. He saw the horse grazing near the edge of the meadow. Hartshorn walked toward him slowly. The horse continued to graze, merely lifting his head to gaze at the man on foot. Then, startlingly shrill came the nicker of another horse. Hartshorn dropped flat in the meadow grass anticipating the appearance of a rider. Had he kept on toward his horse, he might have caught him; but following the trumpet challenge from the timber encircling the meadow came a band of wild horses, manes flickering and tails floating as they charged out into the meadow, stopped, whirled, and roared back into the forest. Hartshorn's horse, with head up and nostrils quivering, followed them—disappeared in the morning shadows of the dripping pines. Not daring to risk the southern desert on foot, the outlaw chose to risk being captured rather than attempt to reach the Mexican border. He did not intend to give himself up. He planned to steal a horse from the corral of the lone homestead on the mead and again turn south—if necessary, shoot down any one who happened to oppose him, help himself to provisions, and trust to the frequent mountain rains to obliterate his tracks.

RIDING THE SKIES

Here's a poem which the little English children used to say ages ago about "Old Mother Goose" and her gander, and the adventures of her son. Children who save these paper dolls every day can act out this rhyme when the set is completed.

Old Mother Goose, when She wanted to wander, Would ride through the air On a very fine gander.

Mother Goose had a house, 'Twas built in a wood, Where an owl at the door For a sentinel stood.

Pres. Coolidge Is Vaccinated

(Special to the Guardian) WASHINGTON, May 1.—All government employees in District of Columbia have been requested by public health service to submit to vaccination against smallpox. President Coolidge was reported to be among the first to signify compliance with request. Washington has had several recent cases of smallpox.

Want New Tariff Put Into Force

(Special to the Guardian) MELBOURNE, Australia, May 1.—Premier S. H. Bruce has cabinet Premier Stanley Baldwin, urging that Chancellor Winston Churchill's preference proposal as issued, be put into immediate operation, because if this is not done the present season's dried fruits and sugars will not come under new tariff as they will reach London before July.

HOPES STRIFE ENDED

BERLIN, May 2.—When told of his election to the German presidency Field Marshal Von Hindenburg, who is at his son's estate near Hanover, declared: "God grant that party strife may at last end. Everything is decided now. Let us hope the people will learn complete unity, for in union there is strength."

the long shadows of early evening deepened and spread. He had kept a packet of tobacco dry in his hat. He chewed the powdery tobacco and it dulled his hunger. An hour before sunset a woman appeared, coming from the cabin and carrying an empty pail. The woman called to some one. A man's figure appeared from somewhere back of the cabin. Hartshorn heard the woman ask the man to get some water. Not knowing how many folk might be about the place, the outlaw decided to wait until supper-time—then steal up to the cabin and take them unaware. (To Be Continued)
