CURSE O' LOVE A Story of Love and its Ties. MILDRED BARBOUR. CHAPTER 59. THE REST OF THE STORY.

Cynthia stared at the black opal in the palm of her slim hand. Gradually, like a vision emerging from the mists of a crystal, a scene reconstructed itself before her amazed eyes. She saw a room—the familiar library of the Greer house. There was a table loaded with beautiful objects—with silver, glass, jewels, lovely vases, pottery, bits of brocade, and tapestry. Gifts—gifts for her and— Her eyes flashed back to the man opposite her, Basil Harcourt, weary and troubled, his brown eyes revealing his inward agony, was staring at her. "Cynthia, can't you remember?" She saw herself, slim and white, with the black opal—the same black opal—on its bed of velvet. She saw Harcourt paling, saying uncertainly: "It's nothing. A touch of the fever. I caught the fever in the East. It comes back sometimes." "Oh!" she gasped, and sprang to her feet. "Oh, it was you, after all!" Still clutching the opal, she swayed and fell. He caught her slim young body in his arms. "What have I done?" he thought frantically, and, still supporting her, rang for a servant. The butler came and summoned Therese, and they took Cynthia to her room. Therese had promised him that she would go with him to his hotel, if her mistress wished to see him. The woman regarded him hostilely and, when she discovered the opal clenched in Cynthia's hand, she shrugged. Harcourt waited in a fever of impatience in his suite at the hotel. It was two days before word came. Then Mr Greer sent for him. He was grim but courteous. "My daughter wishes to see you. She has told me of the explanation you made to her. I will not follow my own judgment in this affair, because I dare say, I should be thankful to you for restoring her memory—even though the things she recalls are far from pleasant. If Cynthia cares to talk to you, I must give my consent."

CORNS Quick safe relief. The most painful corns cease hurting the instant Dr. Scholl's Zino-pads are applied. They strike at the cause of corns—pressing and rubbing of shoes. That's why they are permanent healing. If new shoes cause irritation, a Zino-pad stops it at once. Dr. Scholl's Zino-pads are thin, medicated, antiseptic, protective. No liquids, no risk, no bother. Safe, sure, quick results guaranteed. At your druggist's or shoe dealer's.

"There's little more to tell. I won't repeat what I told you the other day. You recall that I was married to my Chinese sweetheart. We lived in complete happiness for two years. Then orders again came for me to return to England, and even influence couldn't remand them this time. I had to go, and take Nada with me. Besides, she didn't want to go. She was expecting a child and she wanted it to be born in the land of its ancestors. I was determined to manage it somehow. The World War began that summer. My regiment was among the first to be sent to the front. For four years I was in Europe, without even leave to go to England. I heard that my child had died. Then word came to me that Nada also had died. There was nothing to call me back to China. It remained only a beautiful memory—a memory of youth and romance that the years and circumstances had taken from me." He paused and looked anxiously at Cynthia. "You can understand? You can believe?" She nodded. "And then you met me?" "Then I met you—and understood what real love meant. The love of a mature man, not a romantic headstrong youth who snatched at moonbeams. I saw a lifetime stretching before us—before you and me—a lifetime of happiness such as I had never dreamed of."

Cynthia sighed and shook her head. "I'm not so sure, Basil. Perhaps it all turned out for the best. But—but I still don't understand about the black opal." "The opal," he said slowly, "was my wife's message to me. The news of her death was false. Her father hated me, naturally, for taking his daughter from the faith of her ancestors, for making impossible the marriage he had planned for her. He sent the message that told me of her death, and she, poor, poor soul, believed, when I didn't return, that I had deserted her. Don't ask me how she learned of my intended marriage to you; nor yet how she managed to get the opal to you. The Chinese are cunning. But, at any rate, when you showed me the opal that night before our wedding, I knew that Nada still lived. I was not a widower, as I thought. I should have stayed and explained, of course. But I was frantic and ashamed, and I ran away. I went to England, and then, unable to bear more suspense, I returned to China."

IN MEMORIAM GEORGE ROBERT MUNROE.

The angel of death visited the home of Murdoch and Mary McKenzie Munroe, on Friday, September 9th, 1927, and took their only son, George Robert, aged three years, four months and thirteen days, who was the light of their home, and whose place can never be filled. He leaves to mourn, a father and mother, two sisters, Katharine May, and Susie Florence, and numerous relatives and friends. The burial took place in the family plot at Gigg cemetery, and the officiating clergyman was the Rev. Mr. McLellan, Valleyfield, and the Rev. Mr. Grant of Orwell. We've lost the sunshine of our home, Our darling little son, But we know he's gone to live with God. So we say, "Thy will be done." He leaves a space which none can fill. And loving hearts so sore. But we know in the sweet bye and bye. We'll meet on Jordan's shore. (Patriot please copy.) MRS. W. HERBERT POOLE
