JUST A GIRL

BY JANE PHELPS

AUNT SUSAN BRACKET ARRIVES.

Chapter 137.

After Kenneth left, I settled once more back into routine work and the little pleasures I insisted Mother and I have together. These usually meant an evening with Tom and Mary, or a visit to a motion picture show. Living costs were so high that even with my good salary I did not feel that we could afford the theatre, save once in a great while.

It was strange, but I did not think as often of Kenneth as I had before he came to see me—and before I nearly married him. Naturaly I could not dismiss him from my mind, but no longer did he come to me in that same way—he no longer caused me to hesitate in any plan or thought I might make or have in connection with another. I stopped dreaming of him, and he no longer flitted between me and my thoughts of others. Yet I felt sure I would marry him when the six months were up—it seemed to me the honorable thing to do.

His first letter came. He said: "You will never know what a disappointment it was not to bring you back to the ranch with me I need a wife, my home a mistress. I cannot yet quite realize how it was you turned, or changed your mind, so suddenly. I think you care for me—I hope so. But is seems as I think it over that you had become suddenly afraid to trust me, afraid I might not be good to you, or something. I have also wondered if your loyalty to your employer had anything to do with your decision. Surely there are many girls who would be glad of your position, capable girls who could do the work as well.

"I find myself thinking of you in all my spare time, trying to understand just why you refused to come with me. I am not blaming you, Zena. Perhaps it is natural for you to hesitate, to want to know me better before you give yourself to me, yet I am terribly disappointed."

There was little more—principally mesages to Mother, Mary and Tom.

Someway I was disapointed in his letter. I realized I shouldn't be—that I had sent him away alone when he wanted to say, and to take me with him. But he "needed a wife; his home a mistress." No word of love, but—did I want him to say he loved me? I made up my mind that I did not.

"If anything should happen I wouldn't marry him, it would make it harder to say no if he made love to me," I mused as I reread parts of his letter.

Ishowed it to Mother.

"Naturally he was disappointed. But he took a good deal for granted, Zena. I am sure you did right to wait." Then, "A nice friendly letter, under the circumstances. Don't forget to remember me to him when you write."

Mother was determined not to influence me in any way. She would neither praise nor blame Kenneth. She felt, and said, that she had been the cause of my missing so much that I should have had that she was sensitive on the subject.

To my delight, Aunt Susan Bracket wrote she was coming to us for a short visit. Mother and I went to the train to meet her. Really, the porters and taxi drivers could not be blamed for smiling.

"Wait until I set some of these things down, Zena, then I'll say how-de-do!" she greeted us.

She had her birds in a large cage, her dog, a basket of fruit, and a box of home-made goodies, beside her real luggage which a porter carried for her. These things she carried herself.

But neither Mother or I minded, we were so glad to see her. And when we were al packed tightly in a taxi—it was impossible to get her and her belonging home any other way—we all talked at once.

"You see, I couldn't come and leave them at home," the 'them' being the birds and the dog. "Then I knew Mary woudn't give a rap to see me unless I brought her some home-made bread and cake. Careful, Zena! There's beryr pie in that box, hold it carefully! It's marked 'Right side up, with care.'"

"You know I would be glad to see you, Susan, had you brought nothing but yourself," Mother returned, laughing. "Not that I won't eat everything you have brought and enjoy it."

"I can't wait to get home to sample some of the goodies," I broke in.

"We'll have them for supper," Mother said, "and let Susan eat what we have provided. She shan't have one bite of her own cooking."

So, laughing and chatting, we reached the house to find that a box of flowers and a note of welcome for Aunt Susan had arirved while we were at the station. This time I had no need to look at the card to know that Mr Claxton had sent them. How kind and thoughtful he was.

I had told him of Aunt Susan's expected visit, and he had asked to be allowed to meet her.

Tomorrow—Mr. Claxton Dines With Aunt Susan.

FASHIONS FOR CANADIANS

With the question of silhouette bandied about from designer to designer, it is interesting to note the published viewpoint of one of the leading all-American style authorities. He boldly placed himself on record as believing that the straight-line silhouette was the only one ever justifiable. He supported his views by the statement that as the human figure doesn't change from season to season, any attempt to change the "line" of clothes prepared for womankind by attempting to mould a new figure with nipped-in waist-line or bulging hips is the rankest wolly. Style changes in future, forever, if this style authority is to be trusted, will depend upon color variety, novel ideas in the application of trimmings, the use of new and unusual fabrics, and so on, but the silhouette will remain the same.

As a matter of fact, the straight line has held the stage for a number of seasons, defeating all efforts of designers to introduce bustle effects, hip flare and the nipped-in waistline. It seems possible that, like the male of the species, women in future will clothe their bodies without attempting to change the figure nature gave them and depend upon the selection of clothing to bring out their own natural points.

The very straight frock belongs distinctively to the very young, straight figure. The woman who has a mature, developed figure possesses natural, graceful curves that have been taken into consideration by designers. The woman who is no longer slim—the "stout" figure—must be prescribed for sartorially, and there are specialists who make it their business to do just this.

Rich and beautiful materials are very much to the fore this season. Velvet seems destined to have a strong vogue. The sketch shows a velvet frock, designed especially for the type of woman first described—that is, the woman with straight, young figure. The dress is simplicity itself as to style line, broken at the waist by a guide or rich brocade which matches the collar, vest and cuffs.

This frock, made of dark blue or black velevt, would be charming if a vest, collar and cuffs of fine white lace, embroidery, net or batiste were substituted for the brocade. A soft crush girdle of the velevt may be worn, instead of the brocade girdle, when the white accessories are donned. With this arrangement, one frock really become two, as the entire appearance of the dress is changed by the change in accessories.

The small feather toque or turban is in high favor again this season. Either a large picture hat or one of these little feather chapeaux would be smart with the frock pictured. An exceptional color range is exhibited in the line-up of feather headgear.

Superinteding the wardrobe of a child up to six years is a perpetual delight. After that a few "awkward years" usually intervene during which absolutely no dress selected for the young female of the species makes her look anything but "leggy" and angular. Then comes the young debutante age, bringing with it delight again in the planning and preparation of clothes.

Radical style changes or arbitrary style rules never enter into the clothes scheme of the girl up to six years, and if she is not clothed attractively, artistically and at the same time economically—regardless of old H. C. L.— it is because the particular grown-up who has charge of the selection of clothes for this particular juvenile is the wrong person for the job.

Among the frocks now being shown for the fall and winter wardrobe of the little girl none are smarter, simpler nor more wholly delightful than the blouse or smock and blomer combinations made of wool or silk fabric. The sketch illustrates an especially combinations made of wool or silf fabric. The sketch ilustrates an especially charming litle outfit of this type, made of fine navy iserge with bloomer cuffs. There are also collars, cuffs and pockets on the smock of pale tan-colored duvetyn embroidered in a darning stitch in navy wool.

The statement has been made many hundreds of times, and it is worth innumerable repitition, that simplicity is by all odds the safest guide in the designing of clothes for little children. A frock similar to the one shown is smart and serviceable, it obviates the need of pettfcoats and thls economizes laundry, and it is so simple that any woman might cut it without even the aid of a pattern. The bloomers are finished with a band and buttanholes, so that they may be snugly atached to an underbodice.

Another dress of this type displayed by the same designer is made of navy taffeta. Colalr, cuffs, pockets and knee bands are embroidered in wool floss, and an additional panel embroidered on either side of the middy or smock, running from the hem to a height of six or seven inches. Another of the taffeta bloomer and smock outfits is trimmed with natural color pongee, the bands of the pongee being finished with a line of wool embroidery in contrasting colors.

A charming and serviceable coat recently seen for a two to six year old was made of tan-colored polo cloth, untrimmed except for a very narrow line of embroidery in colored wool about al lthe edges, and equipped with a detachable hood of self-fabric. The hood was made large enough so that it might be slipped up over a more dressy bit of headgear if the youngster happened to be caught in the rain or a snowstorm.
