The Girl Who Had No Chance

By MARION RUBINCAM

FEAR

Chapter 24

"Well, if you're goin' to make your fortune here, good luck to you," Mrs. Belding said.

Ruth laughed again. "Wait and see," she answered.

Driven by the idea that she must find someone to fill up her great empty house, she began again looking about her.

She had followed out Mrs. Weed's suggestion of asking the four teachers if they wanted to make an apartment out of the top floor—the same rooms that the old couple from the South had occupied. Her mother had let the rooms then for $10 a month since they were idle and the money was at least that much again.

But Mrs. Weed shook her head at that.

"Too little, even for this small place," she said. "And if you give them kitchen privileges you can expect more. If they want you to give them meals, I'd say $12 a week."

"Each" Ruth asked. It seemed in those days—like a large sum and it seemed larger the more she thought about it. How was it that her mother had rented the place for so little, when her mother was a competent woman when Mrs. Weed was not?

After a time the answer to this occurred to her, too. Mrs. Weed was used to spending fair sums of money for everything she bought. She, therefore, expected a fair sum for everything she sold. Whereas Mrs. O'Niel had dealt in pennies for so many years, that her judgment as to values and been warped. She was able to give but a trifle.

"Think I'd split the difference," Mrs. Belding advised. And Ruth thought that a good idea.

So in the end the four teachers agreed to come and pay $20 a month for their floor and the use of the kitchen, and they agreed on a sum to cover the cost of the coal they would consume, the gas and the oil stoves to keep the rooms warm.

Ruth felt that at last she was on the way to make her fortune. The teachers would stay until school closed at least the rent was a gain of that much money, all she had to do was to keep their place clean and in order, and add a little more linen to her laundry.

Ruth worked while Myra danced. The arrival of the four women took the sense of vast space and vast lonliness from the house, their laughter and the sound of their voices from above cheered her a great deal, and she found three of them pleasant to talk to. Besides, it was nice to see lights in the top of the house when she walked back to it in the evenings.

And all the time Tim was in the city working hard for her.

So the month of November ran along and December began. Even so there was not enough work to keep Ruth busy all the time. She found many hours a day to read and she had periodicals and books from the Free Library to draw on.

Twice a week she wrote to Tim shy little letters that tried to express her affection, but that were always afraid of expressing too much. And twice a week or oftener, she got from Tim brief notes saying he loved her more than anyone else, and telling her how hard he was working. Ruth kept these in a quaint old fashioned tortoise shell box which she used to call her "treasure chest."

The first week in December brought no letter at all, eight days passed before she had word from him. Meantime there was a letter from Myra, part of which stayed in her mind.:

"I'm so glad Tim finally came to the city" it said. "I like having Cousin Emily's friends to run about with but they're all so much older than I am, especially the men. They're very nice to me, but they think I'm a kid and treat me in a sort of condescending manner. But I'll show them! Still, it is nice to have someone around who is specially for me, if you know what I mean by that! Well, I mean Tim.

"Tim's made a great hit with Cousin Emily. Generally she likes only older men—she's 36 really, though you wouldn't think it, and a friend of hers said once when I was around, "If I looked as young as you do, I'd pick out only young men to go around with."

"Emily laughed and answered, The gray hairs make my youthfulness show up in contrast." I guess there's something in that, only I don't want gray haired escorts to make me look younger. I look young enough.

"Anyway, it was nice to have Tim. Emily's had him up here most every day we've been home for tea, which is about three times a week, and to some of the parties where we danced. Tim didn't like going about and not paying his share, he said, but Emily fixed it up so he thinks there was only one host, instead of, as usual all the men splitting up the check—"

The letter ran along in this fashion for another page or so. Then in contrast to it, came a letter from Tim—

"I think about you a lot. It's pretty lonesome sometimes. I've seen Myra, of course, and that red-headed cousin of hers. I should say if Myra wants to imitate anyone, as she seems to, she might pick out someone with more brains. You'd never know Myra don't see much of them though.

In spite of her common sense in spite of her generosity of mind, a little cold gnawing fear crept into Ruth heart and settled there like the November frost outside.

Monday—Glitter

BEFORE MY BABY CAME

I Was Greatly Benefited by Taking Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound

Sydenham, Ont. —"I took your medicine before my baby was born, and it was a great help to me as I was very poorly until I had started to take it. I just felt as though I was tired out all the time and would have weak, faint spells. My nerves would bother me until I could get little rest, night or day. I was told by a friend to take Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound, and I only took a few bottles and it helped me wonderfully. I would recommend it to any woman. I am doing what I can to recommend this good medicine. I will lend that little book you sent me to any one I can help. You can with the greatest of pleasure use my name in regard to the Vegetable Compound if it will help others take it."—Mrs. HARVEY MILLIGAN, Sydenham, Ontario.

It is remarkable how many cases have been reported similar to this one. Many women are poorly at such times and get into a weakened, run-down condition, when it is essential to the mother, as well as the child, that her strength be kept up.

Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound is an excellent tonic for the mother at this time. It is prepared from medicinal roots and herbs, and does not contain any harmful drugs. It may be taken in safety by the nursing mother. C

Says Bissing Was Not The Murderer

LONDON, Feb 14—Responsibility for the execution of Edith Cavell, the British nurse shot during the war in Brussels, has now definitely been placed at the door of General von Sauberzweig, according to the Brussels' correspondent of the Daily Telegaph. The death of Miss Cavell has generally been attributed to General von Bissing, at that time from Baron von Der Lancken, to the German Foreign Secretary, which has but recently been made public relieves that official of this slur on his name, the correspondent writes.

It is also established that General von Saugerzweig had the power to stay the execution in order to give time for an appeal to the Emperor for mercy. To accomplish this, General von Sauberzweig would have had only to withhold his confirmation of the sentence of the court martial.

Baron von Der Lancken was in Brussels at the time as an observer for the German Imperial Chancellory. He wrote the following letter: "The Cavell affair is known to your Excellency in all its details. The effect of it has been what I predicted to von Sauberzweig in an interview I had with him without, however, being able to shake him from his point of view regarding the opportuneness of the execution."

General von Sauberzweig, as successor to General von Kraewel, was ordered to institute a reign of terror in Brussels the correspondent declares, and throughout his administration arrests and condemnations followed one another without cessation.

Four Years After

By

Canon F. G. Scott, C.M.G., D. S. O.

We stopped at the ruined gate of Red Lodge and getting out of the car saw the remains of that building which was so long the headquarters of the battalion in reserve. Not far off was the little cemetery where so many of the 5th battalion men found their last resting place. Of Wood Cote House nothing but a heap of rubbish remains.

We made our way back to the car and passing by the unpronounceable brick house which has taken the place of the imposing building known as Kort Dreuve, surrounded by a moat, now more full of bullrushes than water, we came to the old tree which stands in the middle of the road. It has weathered the storm of war but is battle-scarred, and the wooden seat round its huge trunk is now very shaky. Under that tree many battalions have rested as they passed up the road to Hill 63 and the trenches beyond. We had to stop for a moment and look at the scene. Petit Moncque Farm and Grand Moncque Farm were still there and to the east was thta well remembered and well trodden road to the hill. We sped upward, passing the ruined shrine and the orchard where I had lost Dandy, till we came to the top of the hill, and there, in the distance on the ridge beyond us, we saw the outline of the new Messines. We went down the old road on the other side of the hill which once led to our trenches. The trees are still standing, but no longer is canvas stretched from trunk to trunk to hide the movements of troops from the enemy. At the foot of the hill, where the river Douve now winds through pleasant meadows, is the little British cemetery where at night I buried so many of the gallant 3rd Brigade. We stopped the car and visited the sacred spot. We passed through the gate in the wire fence and there, on the little crosses, I read the names of men of the 13th, 14th, 15th and 16th battalions.

It was a still evening, the sun had almost set, not a sound was to be heard. It was peaceful as the hymn "Abide With Me". The strange impulse which I had felt before to speak to the men by name came over me. I longed to tell them that the war was over, that we had won and that Canada was saved. It gripped one's throat to see the old battalion badges on the crosses, giving a proud distinction to the resting place of our beloved comrades. Far from the main highways the little cemetery lies, but it has not been forgotten and flowers are planted along the rows of crosses. At night the dead were laid there side by side, for the cemetery was once in sight of the enemy. Darkness and often rain and loud winds were their funeral pall and dirge, but as we saw the graves now in the evening light there was no suggestion of gloom, and little birds and soft winds sighing make music there in the long golden summer days. Beneath the ground lay the broken forms of those whose brave spirits had passed through the gates of pain into life and peace. May they rest in the keeping of their Heavenly Father.

Silently and reluctantly we made our way back to the car with one farewell look at that sacred enclosure, and sped onward up the hill past Le Rossignol to Hyde Park Corner, and then up the Messines road. Our trenches in 1915 had crossed this and many is the time I have looked at that road and wondered if ever again it would be used by ordinary travellers. We had tunnelled underneath it but no traces of our work now remain.

Perhaps the fields which were once No Man's Land looked slightly more rough and broken and the grain in them was of a poorer quality. We rose gradually to the village on the ridge, passing, before we came to it, some of the German trenches and outposts. On looking back towards our old line we saw what a commanding position the Germans had held. It was no wonder that in Ploegsteert days we had thought the war would go on indefinitely, and that there was little hope of our being able to break through. There was nothing to attract us in the modern village of Messines except the view from it so we made our way without stopping, to the craters of Wytschaete Ridge.

The road was in excellent condition so we were able to go at a good speed. On the left of us was a wide view of country made rich and mellow by the soft lights in the western sky. Mount Kemmel stood up boldly at the end of the plain, and the other hills so well known in war days were identified one by one.

We came at last to the line of craters which were made in 1917 when the British made their great attack. By the wayside was a huge specimen of what dynamite can do. We climbed up the bank to the right of the road. It was covered with brambles but the chalky soil had been baked hard under the hot July sun. The crater was an enormous hole with a good sized pond of water at the bottom of it. All round the edges where the earth had been thrown back were traces of German dugouts and concrete gun emplacements. The shock of the explosion must have been like a volcanic eruption. The enemy for miles round were stunned and terrified by the hideous roar. There were many other craters besides the one we saw which were caused by the explosion of the mines on that terrible morning. We could have lingered for hours among the gigantic souvenirs of the period of hatred, but time was pressing and the evening sky was growing darker.

We went back to our car and then, without stopping, skirted the base of Mount Kemmel and, passing through Ypres, sped homeward, and drew up before our old friend the tower of Poperinghe Church which looked as if it was pointing with a warning finger to some clouds gathering on the starlight sky.

RELIABLE INFORMATION ON THE STRENGTH OF WOODS IS NOW AVAILABLE

The question of the relative strength of different woods very frequently arises in manufacturing, engineering, building and many other branches of modern industry, and decision as to the kind of wood to be used for a particular purpose is often based on mere opinion, guesswork or figures of doubtful reliability. There is no necessity for this state of affairs so far as Canadian timbers are concerned as the strengths of all native commercial woods have been extensively investigated at the Forest Products Laboratories of Canada (Dominion Forestry Branch) Montreal, where authorative information on the subject is on record.

The testing of timber for strength has been revolutionized in recent years and uniform methods are now in use at the government timber research laboratories in India, United States Canada and elsewhere. These methods, which may be regarded as standard, cover every phase of the operation from the selection of the timber in the woods to the recording of the results of the various tests. Timber Testing is only one of the functions of the Forest Products Laboratories of Canada, but the extent of their investigations in this particular direction is indicated by the fact that upwards of 45,000 tests have been made during the past eight years.
