ANYTHING but LOVE by JANET DORAN

CHAPTER III Miserable thoughts followed Alma along every step of that strangely solemn early-morning round of golf. She could not help but face the truth: She was in love—terribly in love—with Johnny. But he had chosen to erect a barrier between them, because of something in his past—something that he would not reveal to her. Johnny grinned as she fluffed an easy drive, and laid a sympathetic hand on her shoulder. "What's on your mind this morning, Alma? You can beat that with both eyes shut!" Absurdly, she began to cry, and Johnny became distressed. "Hey! What's all this? What's the matter, Alma?" "Nothing, Johnny. I—I'm just tired, I guess. I—I haven't had breakfast, and..." "Nix, infant," Johnny said soberly. "You aren't fooling your Uncle Jonathan one bit. Now—what's it all about?" His hands held her slim shoulders gently, firmly, and his eyes were serious. "I... oh, I can't tell you, Johnny!" Johnny's arms closed about her and stared off across the rolling landscape. "Is your version of love the kind that goes shopping for financial ratings and social importance?" she demanded scornfully. "Because that isn't my idea of love! If I love a man, I'd live on an ash heap—in a shanty—until I could help him fight to something better. I'd..." "You would, Alma darling," Johnny agreed quietly, "but your family wouldn't let you. You're a Whittaker; your mother was a Falkan. And never, in this little town, could you break the social pattern. You can't escape it." "Then I'll leave this town! I'll go away and build my own life, my own happiness! I won't be a sacrifice on the altar of silly, stupid snobbery!" "But would you be happy, Alma? That's the question. You don't know the heartache that can come from a violent break with one's family and friends." Alma turned away from him in exasperation, and started toward the clubhouse. Johnny wearily followed her. "Well," he said flatly, "we might stop working late at night over papers and books that he brought home from the store. And always there had been Sig. Always, after Sig had said good night to her, he had gone to talk with her father, and she never knew at what late hour their business discussions ended. "Johnny," she said suddenly. "Let's go to the railroad station—find out from the agent if Dad was there to see Sig off in the early-morning train" (To be Continued)

The clerk looked worried. "We haven't been able to locate your father anywhere," he told Alma.

tenderly. Then, as Alma raised her tear-drenched eyes to his, a sudden breath-taking light dawned on him. "Alma," he whispered wonderingly, doubtfully. "Alma..." Blindly, their lips met, and during that breathless ecstasy of that first kiss, the golf course, the clubhouse, far in the distance, and all of Burntwood and its smug, hypocritical social system, faded into an indistinct, unimportant blur. "Alma," Johnny said presently, gently releasing her. "Alma... how did this happen? I—I didn't mean it to be. I—I'm sorry!" he floundered helplessly. "You're sorry you kissed me, Johnny?" Alma demanded, and he flinched before the scorn in her eyes. "No," he said miserably. "I'll never be sorry for that, Alma. How could I be, when I've dreamed of holding you in my arms, dreamed of kissing you... It's just that—" "That you have a past that's a closed book, and you think we should make our present and future miserable because of it!" she cut it quickly, pulling her hand from his grasp. "Not exactly," Johnny protested uneasily. "It's that I've nothing to offer you, Alma." He flushed. She was suddenly filled with a strange apprehension, as she thought back and remembered little things that had made little impression on her at the time but now took on new significance. She had noticed that her father had seemed worried and preoccupied lately, and she had urged him to
