Fitzsimmons Queer Work Against Jeffries. Form reversal never had a sharper illustration than in the two battles that Robert Fitzsimmons fought with James J. Jeffries.

When the first match between Fitz and Jeffries was announced, it was generally regarded as a one-sided affair, and the champion was a 1 to 3 favorite over the Californian.

When the going sounded for the fifth round Jeff did not make a move to get out of his corner, and was pushed out by his seconds.

To all outward appearances Fitz was unable to hit Jeff with effect, in the Coney Island battle, despite the fact that the Californian was practically a novice.

For seven rounds Jeff was a punching bag for Fitz, who landed every blow he started. Jeff could not reach Fitz with a left or a right and the boiler-maker's left shoulder failed to save him from the fusillade of shots aimed at him by the Californian.

When "Freckles" came out for the eighth he was unable to hit with any force, and Jeff, realizing that the enemy's fire had slackened, waded in and again knocked out Fitz.

When Jeffries entered the clubhouse on that fine June night he was unquestionably in a highly nervous condition, due undoubtedly to the reputation of the tilt holder.
