"No, Aggy, none for me, I'm too hungry, and the old man's horrible example is still before my mind's eye. I've been leaving that stuff alone.'

"The Lord be praised!" said Aggy, and poured herself a generous glass. "There's no need of wasting His mercies, however. I can take it or leave it, and it has no effect. But to see you so discriminating is like an answer to prayer."

Sir Georrge smiled and began his soup, he hoped not too ravenously. He had not dared to take wine on so empty a stomach.

"This good sense you are showing will fit in well with a plan I have," continued Aggy as she took her soup spoon in hand. "How are you off?"

"Do you mean as to money?"

Lady Sandison nodded. "I do so."

"I'm broke,' Sir George told her, without emotion. "The Yuctan oil scheme was a failure. I came out alive and without debt, but that's all. I have," he hesitated, then laughed, and continued, "I have exactly seven and six between me and the cold world."

"'Michty!" exclaimed Lady Sandison.

The maid brought in the fish and served it, during a profound silence.

When she had taken her way to the elevator, with the soup plates, Lady Sandison spoke:

"The estate is in an awful bad way."

Sir George nodded. "I suppose so."

"What he did with his money's past finding out." Then she looked at the young man thoughtfully. "I've had a long talk with that lawyer body, Mr. Gillespie, and he approves of what I have done. I've let the house."

Sir George stared.

"Subject to your approval, of course, for it's yours. but I wasn't going to let a chance like this slip by. Some American folk that had more money than I could count in a month of Sabbaths. They wanted Sandisbrae and wanted it that bad that they came up to my price. They are highly recommended. I could pay the servants off with the first month's rent, and get them jobs with the new folk, and the rent for the rest of the season put in bank would settle up the debts, if you agree."

"It sounds quite reasonable," said Sir George, and there was silence again as the maid took the fish plates and brought in the meat course.

It was roast beef with potatoes and cabbage but it was the food of the gods to hungry Sir George, who fell upon it.

Lady Sandison, not having his appetite, ate a little more slowly and between bites studied her stepson.

"Seven and six is all you have?"

Sir George, his mouth full, nodded.

"Where'll you sleep?" asked the practical Aggy.

"I haven't decided yet," Sir George looked at her with a smile. "But at that I'm not 'daunted' as you used to say, Aggy. I'll walk to Havilant's club and ask—"

"He's off and away," interrupted Lady Sandison. "His mother told me that, over the telephone, this very day. He was out at Mont Denys for the week end. I doubt she sent him there when she heard you were coming back.'

Sir George looked somewhat discomposed.

"Why did you—"

"I didn't," said Lady Sandison flushing a little. "She called me. It seems she'd heard that I was here and you were expected, and she telephoned me and asked when you were coming."

"She has heard of the collapse of the oil business, I suppose."

"I expect. She seemed to know everything but the date of your arrival and I told her that myself and said that if Lord Archibald wanted to see you he'd just have to wait, as you had things concerning the estate to settle before you were off to America."

Sir George leaned back in his chair. and surveyed this extraordinary woman.

"America! Why on earth should I go to America? Where did you get that idea,"

"It popped into my head," said Aggy. "Lady Havilant was so fearfully condescending like, and so fear ed that you would look up Lord Archie for a loan, that a jist minded myself that the Sandisons were one of the oldest baronetcies in the kingdom and the Havilants but bare two hundred years! So I wasn't letting her try to patronize Sir Steenie's widow or his son. I told her exactly what popped into my head.

"A good bite" you say

Kellogg's PEP Bran Flakes have the nourishment you need. Easy to serve. Easy to digest. All the rich flavor of whole wheat. And enough bran to be mildly laxative.

Enjoy PEP for any meal. Your grocer has Kellogg's PEP Bran Flakes. Guaranteed good!

BETTER BRAN FLAKES

Glad am I that I did, for it kept burling round and round there till I turned it in to as good a plan as any I could think of. So if you have nothing pressing to do the night Sir Geordie—"

He looked at her and smiled. "You go too fast for me, Aggy. I have to look for a place to sleep."

"Then that's settled," Lady Sandison declared, but the look she gave him implored him not to refuse her, "if you'll remember that I'm your stepmother and take a shakedown here at my flat. You're that tall and I'm such a shorty that I think you'll have to take the bedroom, and I'll take the sitting room couch."

To refuse, with those blue eyes, generally so hard, fixed anxiously on him was beyond Sir George. He tried to. He protested, but finally found himself saying: "I'll accept your hospitality gladly, Lady Sandison."

"Aggy."

"Aggy, but I'm to have the couch."

Lady Sandison for the first time that evening actually smiled. "I doubt it," she said. "I doubt if you can double up that small, but we'll leave that until the time comes. At present, while the lass is clearing, we'll have the coffee and cigarettes in the sitting room, and I'll tell you this America plan."

"Yes," agreed Sir George, but he set his handsome jaw. Aggy was quite all right and a splendid manager. She had always been that, but she was not going to manage him into going to America.

Aggy saw the set jaw and began calmly: "You'll have mind when you were a wee bit laddie, I was used to tell you stories of my brother, Robert, in America?"

Sir George absorbed in lighting his cigarette, nodded.

"He's still there, and he's a big man in his way."

"What is his way?"

"Some kind of contracting business. Putting up weirs and grand public buildings, bridges and the awful sky-scrapers that crowd streets over there."

Sir George nodded to signify his comprehension.

"He's by way of being something awful well off."

Sir George's eyes opened.

Aggy nodded solemnly. "Him and me's been at outs for many a long year on account of a real impident letter he sent me some time before I married your father. He doesn't know I'm married. I refused to go out to America and be pampered the way he said he would pamper me. Rob let fly some awful words about 'd-n obstinate females,' so I jist didn't answer his letter. When he sent some lawyer bodies after me I jist told them to take his money and his messages back to him. I would go my own gait. You see," she added, as Sir George looked at her inquiringly, "I was badly needed at Sandisbrae then. It would have been demoralized, but for me. Your father was rarely himself, and things were not as they had been in my lady's time. You were away in France."

Sir George nodded. He did not want to remember those times.

CONTROL OF THE GLADIOLUS THRIPS FOR COMMERCIAL GROWERS

The treatment of gladiolus corms for the control of thrips before planting can be most conveniently carried on for small quantities of corms by the use of dips of corrosive sublimate or hot water. But for commercial producers with a large number of corms to treat, fumigation of the corms, rather than dipping, would probably be the most suitable in that it is quicker, saves handling and eliminates the necessity of peeling off the husks. Two fumigants have given good results and are recommended by the Entomological Branch of the Dominion Department of Agriculture, namely, a mixture of ethylene dichloride and carbon tetrachloride and calcium cyanide.

Ethylene Dichloride and Carbon Tetrachloride

A mixture of ethylene dichloride (75 per cent) and carbon tetrachloride (25 per cent) has given excellent results. This mixture is non-poisonous to humans and non-inflammable. It is used at the rate of 14 pounds per 1000 cubic feet of space, exposing the corms for a period of 24 hours at a temperature around 80 deg. F. After the corms are placed in a wooden air tight container or room, rolls of blotting paper, newspaper or cloth are placed on top and the correct amount of the liquid poured over these. The material could be placed in shallow pans but as it evaporates slowly the blotting paper method speeds up this process. After the fumigant is applied the container should be closed immediately and not opened until 24 hours later. It is most important not to let the temperature drop below 70 deg. F. This work can be done with safety in the cellar or in an unused room. This fumigant kills all stages of the insects including eggs.

Calcium Cyanide

In the province of Ontario this material can only be used under license from the Dept. of Health of that province. Tests with calcium cyanide have given control of all stages of thrips with the exception of the eggs. This material is to be used at the rate of 2 1-2 ounces per 1000 cubic feet of space. Fumigation should be carried on in a tight container or room, exposing the corms for three hours at a temperature of 60 deg. F. or higher. Care should be taken to see that the calcium cyanide, which is a gray powder, does not come into contact with the corms or some damage may result. As this method does not kill the eggs a second fumigation is necessary in order that the thrips hatching from eggs in the corms at the time when the first treatment was given may be killed. The timing of the second fumigation is important and depends upon the temperature of the room in which the corms have been stored. If this temperature is about 70 deg. F. the second fumigation should be given in 10 days; if the temperature in the storage chamber is in the vicinity of 60 deg. F. the second treatment should be delayed 14 days and if the corms are kept at a temperature below 60 deg.. F. an even longer interval between fumigations should be allowed to elapse. After each treatment the corms and the chamber should be thoroughly aired and where a large number of trays of corms are stacked in a chamber an electric fan should be run during the treatment to increase the circulation of air.

The gas from calcium cyanide, as well as the material itself, is a deadly poison and in its use the utmost care should be exercised. All fumigations should be carried on in outbuildings not in dwelling houses, and signs placed on the doors to indicate that fumigation with a poisonous gas is in progress.

The Blarney Stone

(Denis A. McCarthy, LL.D. in The New Freeman)

When Cormac MacCaura was chief of Muskerry
He built him a castle roomy and stout
Within whose strong walls he could laugh and make merry
While vainly his foemen went raging without.

For Cormac, though brave, had a fine sense of humor
Which over his warrior instincts prevailed;
He never would put on his helmet and plume, or
Unsheathe his broad sword till palaver had failed.

So, many a time when his foes in a flurry
Would throng round his gates breathing fury and fire,
He'd say to his wife: "Now Mauvoureen, don't worry,
"Just wait," he would say, "till they tire and retire."

They'd bid him to yield. A refusal he'd send them.
He'd ask them to parley. He liked to do that.
They'd give him their terms. He would move to amend them,
And never give in till he'd beaten them flat!

Their envoys he'd feed and befool and beflatter
As only a natural diplomat can,
Then say to his lady: "I told you I'd scatter
Their forces, and all without losing a man."

Thus Cormac MacCaura, the chief of Muskerry,
In Ireland at large won a diplomat's fame,
And Blarney, the castle wherein he made merry,
To "soothern" speech lent the worth of its name.

And when he was asked how he managed to hoodwink,
And humbug his foes in so skilful a way,
He'd just wink his eye (and I tell you he could wink)
And smile a "deludherin" smile, as he'd say:

"Well, now I'll just tell you the truth. 'Twas a fairy
Once told me about a big stone in the wall,
Which, if I should kiss, there was none so conthrairy
But under the spell of my 'Blarney' would fall.

"So, at her direction, I found it and kissed it,
But, would you believe it? The very next day
Although I felt sure of the place, faith, I missed it,
Nor found it again look however I may."

Well, ever since then, all the wide world over
The name and the fame of the "Blarney" is known,
And thousands, each year, o'er the Castle wall hover,
To kiss what perhaps may not be the right stone.

And many are thinking that may-be the story
Which Cormac related regarding the elf
Was only a modest disclaimer of glory—
The "Blarney" had always been part of himself!

ALBERT G. CARRUTHERS

There passed peacefully to his rest on Sunday morning, May 29th 1932, Albert Garfield Carruthers in his 50th year. There is no slump in the wedding market, at least so far as wedding parties departing from Bonaventure Station, Montreal are concerned, says J. C. Webber, Station Master at the Canadian National Railways depot. Speaking from years of experienre Mr. Webber declares he will miss his guess badly if June this year does not end up quite as prosperous a honeymoon month as June of former years. Thomas Cree, Passenger Traffic Manager, Canadian National Steamships, adds his testimony and states that the recent reduction in fares on Canadian National West Indies steamships is bringing about a considerable travel of Montreal brides and grooms to the honeymoon paradise of the sunny isles of the Caribbean.
