Literature And Life

By BOOKMAN GREAT VOICES

Many years ago now I had the privilege of hearing some great men and of them I wish to write now. There is a famous institution in Edinburgh called the "Philosophical Institution", of which Carlyle was at one time president. Five of us young Canadians had a night there not easily forgotten. The chairman was Lord Roseberry and the speaker was Mr. Asquith. The subject was the "Writing of a biography" — with special reference to Boswell's Samuel Johnson. Not the remotest reference was made to politics and one would never know that either had any connection with that life. Macaulay said that Boswell was "a coxcomb and a bore, weak, vain, pushing, curious, garrulous, that he could not write, that he had no wit, no humor, no eloquence, and yet his writings are read beyond the Mississippi and under the Southern Cross and likely to be read as long as the English language exists. To have heard Asquith was a treat not to be forgotten. Some years ago distinguished men were at Pine Hall giving lectures in a "refresher course" among them Dr. Denney and Dr. Patterson and Dr. Strachan and all three in different years lectured in the School for the Blind on Boswell's life of Johnson. Probably the greatest biography ever written.

Another well-remembered occasion was when I heard Sheriff Guthrie, afterwards Lord Guthrie. He lectured on John Knox. Not many yards away was "John Knox's" house. It is on High Street, Edinburgh, some say the saddest street in Europe for what happened on it.

Guthrie had a most melodious voice and I can still hear the soft cadences in a phrase he used — "a greeting like a bairn." Stevenson has an essay on John Knox and his relations to women. When Queen Mary asked him who he was to be interfering in the affairs of Scotland he replied: "Madam, a subject born within the same." Knox had his own troubles in his domestic affairs. One of his wives was Marjorie Boves and whom he called his "left hand", as she sometimes wrote to his dictation. After her death, then 59, he married a Miss Margaret Stewart, who was but 17. He was then minister of St. Giles Cathedral. This sentence is from Stevenson: "He had copied out for her use a little volume of his own devotional letters to other women."

Carlyle puts Knox among his "heroes." He declares that what Knox did for Scotland was really "a resurrection as from death." It was in the guise of an old Hebrew prophet that this minister of St. Giles appeared in the sixteenth century. He strove to make the government of Scotland a "theocracy." Much was done for education by this strong man — the school and the church were put up side by side; hence the value set upon learning by the "Scots folk."

Another notable that I heard in those far-off days was Sir Conan Doyle. His subject was "Life Boat Service." If my memory serves me right Frank T. Bullen was there also. As is well-known, Doyle was an advocate of spiritualism, but you would never know it that night. Since the two wars people have been thinking of the dead — those who fell in battle. "Does my old friend remember me?" is often asked. We pull at the veil but no answer is heard.

Mark Guy Pearce worked as a missionary in London and it was an event to hear him tell about his work. London is a world in itself and no one can read Dickens and not realize what a place it was in his day. General Booth's name will always be associated with the "down and out" people of that great city.

The mother of parliaments is an attraction quite alone. A friend and I spent eight hours sitting in the same seat and it did not feel long, as the agenda that day was particularly interesting and some notables were heard — Lloyd George, Joseph Chamberlain, and others.

The poet Shelley wrote a poem called "A Letter to Maria Gisborne" in which he refers to London as "that great sea whose ebb and flow on the shore vomits its wrecks — yet in its depths what treasures. You will see, he says, Coleridge, a hooded eagle among blink-owls, and he names others whom she will see, — contemporaries of course. The old country has for long been the mother of great men. Seeing and hearing some of them are events in a lifetime.
