British Soccer Season Will Open On Saturday

By DEREK JAMESON LONDON, Aug. 20 (Reuters) - The British soccer season opens Saturday and once again Britons will fall under the money-for-nothing spell of one of the world's biggest and best-organized gambling industries.

This Saturday and every Saturday until next spring, 50-odd soccer teams will boot a round leather ball up and down stadiums across the country - fun for the thousands who watch. But the real thrill for 16,000,000 Britons comes when special newspaper editions and radio broadcasts report the winning teams.

These are football-pools players who have wagered an average of four shillings on the outcome of the games. The money, if you win, can reach £70,000 for a six-penny bet, though mathematicians calculate the average bettor would have to spend 200,000 years betting to hit it.

In theory, the bettor decides the outcome of certain games and puts down "1" on his coupon for a home victory, "2" for an away win or "x" for a tied game. But housewives, maiden aunts and others who don't know the difference between a goalpost and a goalkeeper usually fill in their coupon blindly.

The minimum stake is normally six attempts - or "lines" - for sixpence. Those who make a life-long study of pools, using "fool-proof" permutations and other systems, often risk up to £1 a week.

People everywhere are in the grip of "pool fever" during the season. Prize money is shared according to the number of winners and only five or six persons will reach the top-prize class. Ironically enough, most of these fabulous prizes seem to go to the "blind" punters.

Mr. Arthur Toombs, employed at the Experimental Farm Napan, N. S., spent a recent week-end with his parents, Mr. and Mrs. Irving Toombs.
