Former Prime Minister Of Sweden Dies

STOCKHOLM, (Reuters) — Hjalmar Hammarskjöld, 51, who as prime minister shaped Sweden's neutrality policy in the First World War, died here Monday. His son, Dag, is secretary-general of the United Nations. Hammarskjöld was born in 1862 in Tuna Manor, central Sweden, which has been in the family's possession since the 16th century. He had quick success in his chosen legal career and became a professor at Upsala University at the age of 26. Six years later he joined the ministry of justice as a civil servant, quitting to enter politics in 1901. A staunch Conservative, he was elected and made minister of justice.

Later, as church and education minister, he took part in negotiations which resulted in Norway's separation from Sweden. In February, 1914, he became prime minister.

Hammarskjöld's policy of neutrality in the First World War was popular with his compatriots, but there were mounting protests against food shortages and his insistence on building up defences in self-protection.

His government lasted until March, 1917. He remained active in legal affairs, serving on many international committees. From 1904-06 he was Swedish member of the International Court of Arbitration at the Hague. He also served as chairman of the Nobel Prize Foundation.

French Farmers Protest Prices

By TOM MASTERSON LUSIGNAN, France, (AP) — Farmer Pierre Rousseau dragged a two-wheeled farm cart onto the highway Monday, stood defiantly in the middle of the road, raised his right arm and shouted to his comrades: "to the barricades." At least 200 farmers took up the cry that once rang throughout France during the French revolution nearly two centuries ago. Within minutes the national highway was solidly blocked at a point seven miles west of this village. Thousands of other farmers in central and southwest France also blocked both main and secondary roads leading into the heart of France's farm belt.

Protest Price Gap

They were protesting against the wide gap between the prices they get for their produce and the prices consumers are paying for it. "This is only the beginning," said one farmer. "We'll go all the way to Paris if it is necessary."

The farmers are seeking relief from taxation and middle-man profits. They say these multiply the cost of beef on the hoof at least five times before it reaches the consumer.

The government rushed truckloads of security troops into the area and warned the farmers to "avoid all actions of sabotage, disorder and violence."
