Here It Is Again

A recent article in a sports magazine has brought up the old subject concerning the doing away with Stanley Cup playoffs and proclaiming the season's first place finisher the champion of the hockey world.

This argument raises its head every now and then. A few fellows agree with the suggestion and point out that articles about the controversy pay no attention whatever to the mutterings and soon the matter is forgotten until someone brings it up at a later date for want of something better to talk about.

The monetary rewards to players and clubs is far too great to have the Stanley Cup playoffs discarded. Teams that get off to a dismal start can always hope to improve their play later in the season, thereby gaining at least a playoff position.

Indeed, some clubs start to play their best hockey early in March and by playoff time they are just itching to tackle opponents. Very often the team finishing first in the season's play is ousted in the playoffs and the second, third or fourth place finisher takes the marbles.

We are convinced that all the lustre would go out of the National Hockey League setup if the playoffs were thrown aside. Players would surely vote against any such move because it would be going against their own best interests. Fans, too, would vote to see the great hockey spectacles of the playoffs fade away. These semi-finals and finals are eagerly looked forward to by all hockey followers and their disappearance would surely ruin the game.

We are certain that attendances would fall off in regular league play when teams are playing that would do no chance of taking the league crown in regular season competition. But with playoffs coming after the regular schedule, all games carry a real importance.

We Firmly Disagree

We know how hard it is to write columns in the off-season. We believe that these "no playoffs" suggestions usually come at this time of year because writers are groping for something to write about.

We can hardly imagine that these writers are sincere in their ramblings. We just attribute it to the scarcity of material available.

Why anyone would want to throw away such hockey class as has been seen in the playoffs is something we will never understand. We are convinced that the bottom would go out of NHL hockey, just as a system was introduced.

Things are going along quite smoothly and the owners are happy about the results. The owners are the ones who pay the salaries and make the whole thing possible.

As long as cheese-slayers want things as they are and are the public being crowded out of the stands, the idea of no Stanley Cup playoffs will never get by the suggestion stage.

And that's as far as it should go.

Utter Nonsense

THIS same magazine suggests that this year's Stanley Cup final was a dismal affair, with Detroit Red Wings no match whatever for the Toronto Maple Leafs.

Somehow we as writers about the abilities of the Leafs, we can't for a minute see why the Wings didn't belong on the same ice as Toronto. The Wings were the ones who were hanging on desperately until Dave Keon fired one into an open net. Although Toronto dropped only one of the five games played, our impression was that Detroit was in there every inch of the way.

It's true that Leafs had more depth than did the Red Wings but this didn't keep the series from being exciting. A few years back the Leafs felt victims to Montreal Canadiens in four straight games and we didn't hear too much talk about "overruns."

After all, on the season's play it was Detroit that enjoyed an edge in games won and in even times, lost and tied one. That record would hardly indicate that Leafs didn't belong on the same ice as "Punch" Imlach's crew.

How foolish can you get?

OF 14 FOOT DINGHY RACERS

Montreal Sailor's Rated King

By JOE DUPUIS
MONTREAL (CP) - Ask Bruce Kirby why he took up sailing and he replies: "I was bored."

It was too cold to start sailing then, so I waited until the spring when the weather was right."

It's only a slight exaggeration. He started when he was six. And today, at 34, Bruce Kirby is the undisputed king in Canada of the international 14-foot dinghy class racer.

Last year he became the first to win a Canadian yachting grand slam, taking the four major competitions for 14-foot racers. The dinghy he sailed was one he designed himself, and it's evident that his racing talent is matched by his talent for designing.

Two of the winning Canadian crews in the 1967 world yachting championships in Toronto were his design. And his designs have been used in Britain and the United States as well as Canada.
