ELLEN'S DIARY

By An Island Farmer's Wife

"I'll walk beside you in the eventide." This was the line of the nuptial hymn that lingered in mind as we turned into the lane of this place "in the road" from Alderlea to greet the children who had run blithely to hail our return. The remembered words brought a smile, for at the moment above the sounds of the summer evening about, and the gay chatter of the lads, we could hear James, husband of ours, talk to the team he had been using in the mow as he turned them to pasture in the front field. We saw him pause to watch as they cantered down toward the stream before he closed the gate and turned away to the barnyard. He would now, we knew, pick up the harness dropped in the unhitching and bear it off to the stable not exactly as a gesture to week-end but with some anticipation of the new one to come, fitting into its complement of new crowding the future. . . . And it came to mind that thus, in a thousand thoughts for our jewel and that of the Family, James walks beside us through our westerling years.

Hurrying the supper and dishes, we went with Jeanie, Granddaughter, Mrs. A. and two other neighboring farmwives this evening to attend a wedding in the Old Kirk at the corner in that curious which is Home. . . . It was not, however, should say any idle curiosity which drew us thither, to appraise the grandeur of assemblage or setting. Because in our time we have seen many a marriage, those supposedly more impressive and as well those which were performed in quite humble surroundings. More than that, in our years we have been able to follow the continuing course of the romance sometimes to the very end to know that neither circumstance nor place contribute greatly to the ultimate success of a marriage. It is the union of two hearts.

What is it then that draws us and womenkind in general to the like? It is, we would say, the air of solemnity about — that meeting of Heaven and earth which the occasion gives. For our part we like best of all the service, above the nuptial music, the gowns and flowers, its hush and expectancy that moment when the Gates of Heaven swing ajar and He, Who in the lang syne lent assistance to a wedding in Cana, smiles down His benediction on the twain.

We thought, as the setting sun flooded in glorious colors the west, and through the high colored panes of its windows sent lovely reflections within, the Old Kirk never provided a more beautiful setting for any bride than for this evening. Very winsome she was in her bridal white, and attractive her attendant in a pastel blue.

"And that's getting married!" Granddaughter sighed happily as we came away from this, her first wedding, a promised outing which had been much in her mind all day. "But tell me," she smiled, "why did they kiss?"

"To seal the ceremony," Jeanie explained. Aye, to bind forever . . . and to give fond and inspiring thoughts the one for the other, together or apart down through their years.

"Dear, when I think of you, I too must think Of things that always are a part of you, All glad and beautiful — of open fires, Of Autumn sunshine melting through the blue Clear sky upon the fallen leaves, Of books and rare old pictures, and of flowers, Of starlight and of moonlight and of songs, Well sung — that glorify the common hours.

And dear, I find that when I think of you My thoughts are freed from all the false and wrong, My being is uplifted, like as one Who in some dim cathedral hears the song And prayer of unseen suppliants — and there Exalted with a new sweet sense of true And better things, may go away transformed. Thus, dear, my thoughts are when I think of you." Until Monday . . . Diary . . . Good-night . . .

That Body Of Yours

By James W. Barton, M.D.

EXTRACT OF HEART MUSCLE IN TREATMENT OF HEART DISEASE

We are getting used to hearing about gland extracts — insulin for diabetes, liver extract for anemia (thin blood), extract of hog's stomach for indigestion, and about extract of the muscle forming the walls of the heart — the muscle that enables the heart to pump blood to the lungs to be purified and to all parts of the body to nourish all the tissues and remove waste from them.

In 26 patients with decompensated myocardial conditions (heart muscle not strong enough to pump the blood properly) and who had extra beats of the heart, these extra beats disappeared and a normal rhythm of the heartbeat was restored by combined injections of the extract into the muscles together with regular doses of rocofen taken by mouth for eight to ten days.

These same favorable results were obtained in patients in whom the tendency to extra systoles (first beats of the heart) required long treatment by digitalis preparations as well as those in whom the extra beats were caused by true organic heart disease. Pain and breathlessness at night disappeared almost completely in 43 patients with less severe heart disease but the heart muscle did not grow any stronger.

In 34 patients with severe angina pectoris (vice-like pain in chest) who were given a four-week course of treatment with two intramuscular injections of 1 cc. of "rocofen" and three tablets by mouth per day, complete or almost complete relief from the agonizing constant sense of pressure was obtained within 10 days. "The severe attacks subsided completely or became less frequent and less severe and in some of the patients the improvement was revealed by the electrocardiogram."

Dr. Gref concludes that "rocofen" is a valuable adjuvant (helper) in the treatment of heart diseases and is of great importance in the treatment of angina pectoris.

As we think of how our research workers are using extracts of the various organs — pancreas, liver, stomach lining, pituitary, thyroid, adrenal, sex and other glands — to correct defects or deficiencies of the organs of the human body, we may wonder why we smiled in former days at the "medicine" men of savage tribes who boiled various organs of animals and used the liquid therefrom to heal their sick. We must all realize more and more every day that man is fearfully and wonderfully made.
