

Politicians for students

How the candidates fared at "The Pit"

By Kelly Mason

Bear with me, please, fellow intellectuals. This is my first article for the Cadre.

This article is to bring you the tidings of election cheers.

As you may have noticed, posters are starting to materialize out of no where. They've been sighted in the bathrooms, on the walls, and just about everywhere else. These people who are plastering their names everywhere must care.

What exactly do they care about and who the heck are they?

The first question can be answered quite easily, as it was repeated through the whole Q and A. They care about the students, and it's about time someone did.

The candidates made a big deal about not making any promises, and that was a relief. I could just picture some of them promising us really unrealistic and fantastic promises as it is the trend with the politicians of the outside world. Our politicians constrained themselves and did a fabulous job speaking to a noisy crowd of students. The running candidates hinted at a "new" idea. Their idea is that they are concerned about the student voice. They want us to talk and speak out about what concerns us the most.

A very good question was asked: what issues did they think were important to the students? One brief answer was: tuition. We are all concerned about the rising cost of tuition and maybe the representatives can do something about it. As one of the candidates mentioned, they cannot promise that tuition will be non-existent next year but they would work on that issue.

The positions that the candidates are running for are: Vice President External (on position), Business Representative (three positions), Board of Governors Representative (one position), Senate Representatives (two positions), Arts Representative (one position), First Year Representative (one position) and Senior Class President (one position). There you have it seven positions and guess how many students, in total are running for those positions? The grand total is seventeen students. And who are those and what positions are they running for?

There you have it. The complete list of candidates and what they are running for. I want to wish the candidates good luck in their running and I hope that the students will vote responsibly. By that I mean vote for who you think will do the job. Vote for the one who you think will better represent you and your class.
