THE PIRATE.

By Sir Walter Scott.

CHAPTER XXXVII.

Over the mountains and under the waves,
Over the fountains and under the graves,
Over floods that are deepest,
Which Neptune obey,
Over rocks that are steepest,
Love will find out the way.

The parting of Fletcher from Claud Halero and the sisters of Burgh-Westra, on the spot where it took place, was partly occasioned by a small party of armed men being seen at a distance in the act of advancing from Kirkwall, an apparition hidden from the Uddaler's spy-glass by the swell of the ground, but quite visible to the pirate, whom it determined to consult his own safety by a speedy return to his boat. He was just turning away when Minna occasioned the short delay which her father had observed.

"Stop," she said; "I command you! Tell your leader from me, that whatever the answer may be from Kirkwall, he shall carry his vessel, nevertheless, round to Stromness; and, being anchored there, let him send a boat ashore for Captain Cleveland when he shall see a smoke on the Bridge of Broisgar."

Fletcher had thought, like his messmate Bance, of asking a kiss, at least, for the trouble of escorting these beautiful young women, and perhaps, neither the terror of the approaching Kirkwall men, nor of Minna's weapon, might have prevented his being insolent. But the name of his Captain, and, still more, the unparalled, dignified and commanding manner of Minna Troil, overawed him. He made a sea-bow, promised to keep a sharp look-out, and, returning to his boat, went on board with his message.

As Halero and the sisters advanced towards the party whom they saw on the Kirkwall road, and who, on their part, had halted as if to observe them, Brenda, relieved from the tears of Fletcher's presence, which had hitherto kept her silent, exclaimed, "Merciful Heaven! Minna, in what hands have we left our dear father?"

"In the hands of brave men," said Minna, steadily—"I fear not for him."

"As brave as you please," said Claud Halero, "but very dangerous rogues for all that. I know that fellow Altamont, as he calls himself, though that is not his right name; neither, as debosbed a dog as ever made a barn ring with blood and blank verse. He began with Barnwell, and every body thought he would end with the gallowes, like the last scoundrel in Venice Preserved."

"It matters not," said Minna—"the wilder the waves, the more powerful is the voice that rules them. The name alone of Cleveland ruled the mood of the fiercest amongst them."

"I am sorry for Cleveland," said Brenda, "if such are his companions,—but I care little for him in comparison to my father."

"Reserve your compassion for those who need it," said Minna, "and fear nothing for our father—God knows, every silver hair on his head is to me worth the treasure of an unshined mine; but I know that he is safe while in yonder vessel, and I know that he will be soon safe on shore."

"I would I could see it," said Claud Halero; "but I fear the Kirkwall-people, supposing Cleveland to be such as I dread, will not dare to exchange him against the Uddaler. The Scots have very severe laws against thefts—so they call it."

"But who are those on the road before us?" said Brenda; "and why do they halt here so jealously?"

"They are a patrol of the militia," answered Halero. "Glorious John touches them off a little sharply,—but then John was a Jacobite."

"Mouths without hands, maintain'd at vast expense,
In case a charge, in war a weak defence;
Stout once a month, they march, a blustering band,
And ever, but in time of need, at hand."

I fancy they halted just now, taking us, as they saw us on the brow of the hill, for a party of the sloop's men, and now they can distinguish that you wear petticoats, they are moving on again.

They came on accordingly, and proved to be, as Claud Halero had suggested, a patrol sent out to watch the motions of the pirates, and to prevent their attempting descents to damage the country.

They heartily congratulated Claud Halero, who was well known to more than one of them, upon his escape from captivity; and the commander of the party, while offering every assistance to the ladies, could not help condoling with them on the circumstances in which their father stood hinting, though in a delicate and doubtful manner, the difficulties which might be in the way of his liberation.

When they arrived at Kirkwall, and obtained an audience of the Provost, and one or two of the Magistrates, these difficulties were more plainly insisted upon. "The Halcyon frigate is upon the coast," said the Provost; "she was seen off Duncauby-head; and, though I have the deepest respect for Mr. Troil of Burgh-Westra, yet I shall be answerable to law if I release from prison the Captain of this suspicious vessel, on account of the safety of any individual who may be unhappily endangered by his detention. This man is now known to be the heart and soul of these buccanniers, and am I at liberty to send him aboard, that he may plunder the country, or perhaps go fight the King's ship?—for he has impudence enough for anything."

"Doubtless enough for anything, you mean, Mr. Provost," said Minna, unable to restrain her displeasure.

"Why, you may call it as you please, Miss Troil," said the worthy Magistrate; "but in my opinion, that sort of courage which proposes to fight singly against two, is little better than a kind of practical impudence."

"But our father?" said Brenda, in a tone of the most earnest entreaty—"our father—the friend, I may say the father of his country—to whom so many look for kindness, and so many for actual support—whose loss would be the extinction of a beacon in a world he will indeed weigh the risk which he runs, against such a trifling thing as letting an unfortunate man from prison, to seek his unhappy fate elsewhere?"

"Miss Brenda is right," said Claud Halero. "I am for let-a-be for let-a-be, as the boys say; and never fash about a warrant of liberation, Provost, but just take a fool's counsel, and let the Goodman of the Jail forget to draw the bolt on the wicket, or leave a chink of a window open, or the like, and we shall be rid of the rover, and have the one best honest fellow in Orkney or Zetland on the lee side, one bowl of punch with us in five hours."

The Provost replied in nearly the same terms as before, that he had the highest respect for Mr. Magnus Troil of Burgh-Westra but that he could not suffer this consideration for any individual, however respectable, to interfere with the discharge of his duty.

Minna then addressed her sister in a tone of calm and sarcastic displeasure—"You forgot," she said, "Brenda, that you are talking of the safety of a poor insignificant Uddaler of Zetland no less a person than the Chief Magistrate of the metropolis of Orkney—can you expect such a person to condescend to such a trifling subject of consideration? It will be time enough for the Provost to think of complying with the terms set to him—for comply with them as length he both must and will—when the Church of Saint Magnus is beat down upon his ears."

Patriotism versus Party.

(Montreal Star.)

We are not at all surprised to find that some Liberal representatives in Parliament hesitate to oppose the Fishery Treaty. They cannot, if they allow themselves to reflect independently on the subject, but see that the arrangement that has been made is fair to all concerned, and is one which the Canadian Parliament can honorably sanction.

The Treaty does not require Canadians to make any concessions which are in the slightest degree humiliating. There is not a Maritime Province man who, if he had the making of the treaty himself, would not have cheerfully conceded to American fishermen entering Canadian ports in distress all the advantages which the treaty extends to them. They are nothing more than one neighbor is glad to extend to another who is so unfortunate as to need assistance. Permitting American fishermen to purchase supplies in Canadian harbors is a concession of great value to the Americans, but it is without corresponding advantages to Canadians. If it is an advantage for the American fisherman to be able to purchase supplies in Canadian ports, is it not also an advantage to the Canadian merchant and the Canadian farmer to be able to sell his home supplies? It is quite true that being thus enabled to purchase supplies near the fishing ground gives the dishonest American fishermen facilities for poaching and smuggling, but we are not quite sure that he would not poach and smuggle if those facilities were denied him. And is not the advantage of having the fishery question settled once for all worth the sacrifice if sacrifice it is—on the part of Canadians. The compromise is not a very costly one if all that it requires is a little extra vigilance and exertion on the part of our cruisers and Custom House officers. These are the only advantages that the treaty extends to the Americans without an equivalent. The admission of Canadian caught fish into American ports free, in return for the privilege of buying bait and transshipping cargoes in Canadian harbors, is all things considered, a fair deal. Could any of the men who are denouncing the treaty have made a better bargain; or if the responsibility of making an amicable arrangement with our American neighbors rested upon their shoulders, would they have felt themselves justified in rejecting this proposition? We do not believe that they would. The Canadian critic of the treaty, particularly if he is a member of Parliament, should try to put himself in the place of the negotiators and ask himself if he could have devised a better compromise, one which would stand any chance of being accepted by the American diplomatists, to say nothing of the American Congress and the American people, than that which has been made in the treaty.

Doutney a Little Ahead of the Facts.

An Ottawa despatch to the Toronto World says: The statement made by Mr. Doutney in Toronto yesterday that Sir John and Lady Macdonald had banished wine from their table is as foolish as it is uncalculated for. Sir John, as it telegraphed on Saturday, gave a dinner at Earncliffe that evening. Twenty members of Parliament were present. There were several kinds of wine on the table. Neither Sir John, Lady Macdonald, nor the Premier's son partook of the beverage, but such of the guests as desired wine were served. This is the custom at all the Premier's dinners during the session, at which members or a mixed assemblage attend. It is doubtful if Messrs. Crossley and Hunter authorized Mr. Doutney or any one else to make such a statement on their behalf. Everyone who knows the Premier intimately, or who partakes of the hospitalities of Earncliffe, is aware that he has become remarkably temperate in his declining years, that he has observed these principles for a considerable time, but that he does not believe in alleged temperance reformers, many of them "fakirs" at best, using his name as an advertisement for their shows in this unwarrantable manner.

Destitution in Arran.

Mr. Michael Davitt writes to the Dublin Freeman's Journal that six hundred of the inhabitants of the Arran Islands, on the west coast of Ireland, are utterly destitute, and that unless a supply of food is sent them forthwith, they will die of starvation. Nor is food for immediate consumption all that is necessary. The supply of seed potatoes upon which these people had depended for the spring planting has been entirely exhausted to keep soul and body together, and it is almost as urgent that they should have seed for their subsequent maintenance, as that they should have relief for their immediate necessities. No such depth of misery has been reached by the people on the west coast.
