Britain Celebrates Trafalgar Victory; Hears Warning

LONDON, Oct. 21 - (Reuters) - Britain, celebrating the Battle of Trafalgar which enabled the Royal Navy to rule the waves, was warned today that she could be brought to her knees if her sea lines were cut.

Londoners marked the 1805 victory with a rally in Trafalgar Square around the 170-foot memorial column to Admiral Lord Nelson, one-eyed victor in the greatest sea battle of the Napoleonic wars.

Surrounded by naval tributes from Commonwealth countries, Admiral Sir Cecil Harcourt, commander of the Home Fleet's base, delivered the warning. If Britain's ocean communications were blocked, he said, an enemy could defeat her without sending a soldier or dropping a bomb.

At a Navy League luncheon, James P. L. Thomas, First Lord of the Admiralty, recalled Nelson's cry, "Give me more frigates." The call still holds good today, he said, although "keep proud" it referred to heavy ships of the line while now it means destroyer-type submarine killers.

The Admiralty's main concern, he said, was in building up the force of destroyers, frigates and minesweepers to keep open the sea lanes stretching out from Britain as the nerve centre of the Commonwealth.

Thomas also said the Royal Navy is making provision for "revolutionary weapons." He did not explain this, beyond saying some of them might have "a profound impact on naval tactics" as the battleship or the aircraft carrier.

Last March it was reported Britain would soon have a test model of a fast reaction atomic pile which could be used to power a ship.

At Portsmouth, where Nelson's flagship H. M. S. Victory is still moored, a wreath was placed on the deck where the Admiral fell.

Mr. and Mrs. George Nisbet, Portland, Maine, are visiting relatives in this vicinity. Mr. Nisbet's mother, Mrs. MacKinnon, Harmony, is quite ill.
