EXPLORATIONS

Chapter 74
 Gloria's sharp eyes searched and searched the crowd and George kept looking from the mass of people to Gloria; and Pan, who wanted awfully to help, scanned the strange faces for one which would look like that of the miniature she knew was packed in Gloria's jewel box.
 But none appeared and when they had collected their bags and trunks and found a taxi, the crowd had melted away like snow before a hot sun. The people in the station were those hurrying for suburban trains.
 They all seemed blonde, they had amazingly clear high-colored complexions, the men all seemed well dressed and the women all badly

so. That was Pan's first impression of Londoners.
 There was no Santley.
 "He's out of town for the week-end," said Pan.
 "Or didn't want to come—oh there are lots of reasons. It was silly—I didn't mean to wire," Gloria said. Having told part, she was ready to tell Pan everything now.
 George had gone to a club where he was a member, Frankie had his supper and was put to bed. Later in their street suits, they met George for dinner and a quiet restaurant and a stroll around central London until bedtime.
 "After the lights at home, it's dingy," Pan said once.
 "That's almost always a first impression. But you'll like it as well or better in a few days," George told her.
 "I feel as though I were walking with ghosts," Gloria said once, and shivered a little. "He might have been standing on this very curb two weeks ago."
 "And so might a few hundred other people you will never see again," George observed.
 Gloria laughed.
 "You always pull me back to earth when I fly off too high. Well, you're right and I'm morbid, and Pan's tired—look at her eyes, black rings under them! We'll go home, all of us."
 Sunday she dutifully took Pan and the boy sightseeing Monday she was restless.
 Tuesday she went to an auction place where estates of international fame are often sold, and where priceless pieces of furniture and works of art go weekly under the hammer. She made a few purchases arranged for packing and shipping dutifully wired her New York client—and was restless again.
 "There's nothing more to do here, we'll go to Paris," she announced. "George, you're staying
