BOTH OVER 21

By Samuel Hopkins Adams

She lifted her arms and her eyes were narrow and heavy. He felt the flutter of a sob break through her lips to meet his quickening breath. It shattered his resolution. "Don't go," he whispered.

"I've got to."
"Of course, I know that. I shouldn't have said it."
"Don't be sorry. I'm not. Not for any of it," she said passionately. "That isn't so bad, then."
"I don't want to go. You know that."

"Yes, I know that."
"Good-by, dear."
"Good-by, Maida."
They kissed again, and she walked erect, steady, courageous, up the steps and into the house.

It was only when she walked down the path for the last time and saw her bicycle with the empty basket around its neck, alone and forlorn that she broke for a moment. She said good-by to the bicycle last.

Three quiet and pleasant school-teachers turned up as the cabin mates of Miss M. McCabe in No. 80 on E deck, which was farther down in a ship than she ever been before except on explorations. They were unobtrusively considerate, and Maida discovered that the mere fact of her not knowing people did not necessarily relegate them to another category of beings.

As the ship moved out everyone seemed to be lining the rail, so Maida went too. A volunteer escort of swooping sails, buzzing motorboats and gala tugs kept pace with the departing monster, and the girl found herself wishing that some of the shouted messages and god-speeds were directed to her. She felt lonely, forsaken. She drifted along to the halfdeck and gazed wearily out over the dispiriting spectacle.

Chapter XXVII

They were turning the last near point of rock now. On it appeared a spot of gleaming white, far and lonely and quiet. Of course it couldn't be, Maida assured herself, and her impression of a bicycle beside it was a vagary of disordered eyesight. What of it anyway? Everyone in Bermuda rode a wheel, and most of them wore whites. But everybody did not stand on remote rocks, in suits of unmistakable cut, while the Ocean Princess sailed. Some kind and observant fellow passenger next her laid a pair of glasses in her trembling hand.

The figure leapt forward to the summons of the powerful lens. Ridiculous to wave in that crazy fashion. How could he possibly recognize her in the mass of humanity? She could not even be sure that the figure was turned toward the ship. It did not signal. It did not move. It merely stood. Without aftermath! Sea and sky and shore were blurred out in a mist more blinding than any fog curtain with which nature had ever obscured her still vexed Bermoothes.

Modern youth does not go in for heartbreak. Maida was fundamentally a sound and healthy product of her period and circumstances. Being sorry for herself was, by her standards, sloppy sentimentalism. She had had her fling. If it left a hollow spot, that was the price exacted. She would slip back into the groove. Tradition and return to her accustomed environments would help. Yes, she'd get over it.

That she should see Wallis Kane again was unlikely. But she did want reassurance that he had got back all right. Ordinary human feeling dictated her taking that much interest. After waiting nearly a week she called up the Amalgamated Dairies office.

Was Mr. Wallis Kane still with the company?

He was.

And was he back from Bermuda on his vacation?

"Yes," answered the official voice.

"Did you want to see him?"

"No," said Maida hastily.

"(Liar!" said Maida's heart.) "I merely wanted to know."

She sent him a wire. A bright, pleasant, friendly little word of good wishes. No answer came. Well, she hadn't really looked for any. She became scornful of herself for having written. It was a foolish thing to have done. That he ignored it was balm to her conscience, as proving that he had not been seriously hurt. So she felt better about it. She also felt annoyed. It was just like him to end it thus abruptly. Back of his sweetness and ease and humor, she had sensed that he was hard. Nobody except a pretty callous person could have

Master Glands Of Life Grown Under Glass

By ALTON L. BLAKESLEE

NEW YORK, March 17 — (AP) — Pituitary glands, the master glands of life, are being grown in glass houses and are yielding cheap harvests of scarce, expensive hormones. It was disclosed tonight.

One harvest is hormones that stimulate sex glands to make sex hormones. Another is ACTH, a wonder hormone for arthritis. Another is a hormone that controls body growth.

This far-reaching achievement was announced by Dr. Leonard Scheele, surgeon-general, United States Public Health Service. He spoke at the premier of a new film describing research on the cause and cure of cancer.

The new method may lead to practical, mass production of these vital hormones, Dr. Scheele said.

The pituitary glands growing in glass houses are taken from rats. But they produce hormones just like those made by the human pituitary.

The pituitary is a pea-sized organ at the base of the brain. Its hormones regulate other glands, including the thyroid, the male or female sex glands, and the adrenal glands.

The rat glands are kept alive in glass flasks, about the size and shape of a pocket watch. They are bathed in a solution of horse serum and an extract from chick embryos.

More than 150 rat glands have been grown this way, some as long as 10 weeks. They probably can be kept alive even longer, Dr. Scheele said.

As the gland grows, it keeps producing its potent hormones.

ACTH brings prompt relief from pain in rheumatoid arthritis. It aids in rheumatic fever, and temporarily stops leukemia, a cancer of the blood. It makes the adrenal gland produce cortisone, another hormone that relieves arthritis.

Both cortisone and ACTH are expensive and still scarce. Other glands probably can be kept alive in the same way. A next step will be to grow pituitary, thyroid, sex glands, and adrenal gland in the same bottle, to learn more about the inter-play of these chemical regulators. Such knowledge would help in understanding what hormones do, and the relation between hormones and cancer, Dr. Scheele said.

As he had about cutting off the element poor from the milk supply.

It was, she told herself, an asset, that hard streak. It saved one a lot of silly regrets. Maida decided that sentiment got you nowhere. And if it did, it wasn't where you wanted to go. She clearly perceived that the thing to do was to be gay and forget all about it.

The charperoning Aunt Toni, who had been kept in the dark as to Maida's adventure, found the girl quieter and more thoughtful than before, on the whole improved, as she wrote Vanderlyn Lind, adding that the engagement to Simms Waring seemed to have stalled. Maida would not commit herself to a wedding date. For this hesitancy she gave no valid reason, having none to give that would not have stricken the household with horror. She wanted to get Wallis Kane out of her system before marrying Simms.

With a fair deal she might have managed it. But circumstances conspired to lay pitfalls for her peace of mind. The first was a glaring, blaring announcement on a billboard of another Lex-Lohengrin prize contest. Maida went out of that street, walking rapidly. Next came a newspaper advertisement of the Amalgamated Dairies with a footnote: "Our delivery men are especially chosen for courtesy and cleanliness."

MOSCOW, March 15 — (AP) — The final count in Russia's general election last Sunday gave an overwhelming vote of approval to the single-bloc list of Communist Party and non-party candidates, figures released by the central electorate committee showed today. The official figures showed that 99.98 per cent of Russia's registered voters cast ballots for deputies in the two houses of the Supreme Soviet (parliament). ### JINKED BY BUILDING

ALBANY, N. Y., March 16 — Police today charged a man with setting fire to a building because they said, he claimed it was jinking him at poker. Joseph Paderisky, 45, a laborer, pleaded innocent in court to a charge of first-degree arson and was ordered held for a hearing. Police quoted him as saying that he thought the building was jinking him, so he went to a rear office, opened a fuel oil drum, dropped a lighted cigaret near the spreading fuel and walked out. Damage to the building was slight.
