Membership is Boiling in Again.

WASHINGTON (AP)—A recurring problem of industrial life is whether workers should be compelled to belong to a labor union. Long a major irritant between labor and management, it is boiling up again in collective bargaining, the courts and in Congress.

Compulsory unionism, as many employers call it, is the latest labor law. It is a maze of federal and state laws and legal decisions.

Several key cases now are before the U.S. Supreme Court and the question lately has been the chief issue in labor troubles in the aerospace industry. The basic issue is simple: 1. Unions cannot, since they are required by law, to represent all workers in a bargaining unit, all should contribute toward union financial needs. They defend non-members as free riders and free-loaders.

Employers who haven't given in to compelled union membership maintain that employees should be free to belong or stay out of a union, but it is wrong to compel them to belong, but as a matter of labor law, it is wrong to compel them to belong to a church or political party.

Equally important to many bosses is the realization that to guarantee a union, the employer will be union member. It is to ensure the union's power both a positive and a negative antagonist and as a likely adversary in local and national political arenas.

The union wants the continuing economic and political power that is inherent in an assured union membership and income from dues payment. A labor organization is a permanent constant force of organizing workers in firms with heavy capital investment and concentrated more thoroughly on its efforts to increase worker wages and benefits.

This is why the compulsory union membership issue is the cause of many strikes. The union is seeking greater power that the employer naturally doesn't want to give.

Required union membership, despite all debate about it, is an widespread fact of industrial life. President Kennedy said some months ago—in an aerospace firm—to grant the union space for two-thirds of the employees approved—most major industrial companies or industries in the United States accepted the union shop many years ago, the steel industry.

Right-to-work laws. These state that the right to employment cannot be limited by reason of union membership or non-membership.

The right-to-work states are Alabama, Arizona, Arkansas, Florida, Georgia, Indiana, Iowa, Kansas, Mississippi, Nebraska, Nevada, North and South Carolina, North and South Dakota, Tennessee, Texas, Utah, Virginia and Wyoming. It will be noted none of the major industrial states, unless Indiana is so considered, have enacted such laws.

Some union men seriously question, in private, whether compulsory union membership is a wise thing from organized labor's standpoint. They say a worker joining a union voluntarily, as a matter of conviction, is stronger industrial soldier than the worker just joining the union automatically and perhaps reluctantly.

REDS ORDERED FROM IRELAND

REYKJAVIK IRELAND (AP) Two Russian diplomats have been ordered to leave Iceland on charges of trying to exploit an Icelander as a spy. The government said they were being hired by union members of the local Communist party who refused to accept money from them. The foreign ministry said the two were trying to get information about the United States and Keflavik.

A foreign ministry statement identified the diplomats as Lev S. Kozlov, secretary of the Soviet embassy, and Lev Dimitry, an embassy official.
