Intensity Of Quake Was 8 Plus

WASHINGTON (AP) — The Alaska earthquake released 10,000,000 times more energy than the atomic bomb which destroyed Hiroshima near the end of the Second World War, the U.S. Coast and Geodetic Survey reported.

The survey's director of seismology, Leonard Murphy, gave this comparison in a preliminoarly analysis of reports from Alaska and reports about the tremor received from more than 100 stations on all the continents.

The Hiroshima bomb's energy release was equivalent to that of 2,000 tons of TNT.

The survey chief, Rear Admiral H. Arnold Karo, and the chief seismologist told a press conference that until study and additional reports are received, the survey rates the quake at "eight plus" on the Richter scale that measures magnitude of power and shock.

This is in the same magnitude area, Murphy said, as the San Francisco quake of 1960, is slightly under the 8.5 Richter readings for the Chile disaster of May, 1960, and equally-rated quakes in Assam, India, in 1950 and in Ecuador in 1906.

The Richter scale has no upper limit.

Murphy located the probable origin of the Alaska quake at from 30 to 60 miles below the surface at 61 north latitude and 147.5 west longitude. He said this centre could have been from 10 to 30 miles across, meaning that it could have been under the waters of Prince William Sound or under land near Cordova.
