Hunters Corner Poaching Remains Problem On Island Says Columnist

Sunday, February 22nd, was a bitter winter day. It was bright and sunny but the temperature hovered around 10 above and a brisk nor'wester had the edge of a well honed knife.

A few days before he retired he was a member of a panel group on TV. When asked a question on the problem of game law infractions in the province his face fairly beamed: "We have it solved up" and went on to infer that poaching, while not extinct like the Great Auk, was fast approaching this happy state.

I drove to Bunsbury, parked the car and walked down the track past the station. I turned right through the gate that opens into the Jones field and as I did I noted where three sets of foot prints had turned sharp to the left and struck off across the field toward Fullerton's Marsh about a quarter of a mile distant.

I examined the foot prints. I decided they were young men wearing No. 8 boots and that they were a scant 15 minutes ahead of me. A fine, salty ground drift was beginning to cover a portion of the bottom. It was the formation of the foot prints that caught my eye.

When they reached the Reddin dam on the Creek headwaters they branched off in a south westerly direction through the woods. I was over a mile from the car and it was evident they didn't intend to retrace their steps but instead were bent on following the woods either to a point behind Reeve's orchard or one the Bunsbury Road.
