Opening lead—king of hearts.

West's informatory double was on the light side, but is permissable because of the adaptability of his hand to any suit East might name. North's redouble indicated a good hand containing at least 10 points, and his follow-up three spade bid showed excess values sufficient to warrant a game contract.

South won the ace of hearts and and back to his king, led the jack after playing to the ace of spades of diamonds and finessed. East won and returned the ten of clubs, trapping declarer's king, and the contract was defeated, South losing a heart, a diamond and two clubs.

It was not a difficult hand to make. South succumbed to the temptation to finesse the diamond and paid the full penalty for taking the unnecessary finesse. Probably the bidding persuaded him that West had the king of diamonds to justify his informatory double, but it was nevertheless a needless risk to take.

West is marked with the Queen of hearts, having opened the king originally. After two rounds of trumps a heart should be led toward dummy's jack. When West takes the king, the diamond finesse is no longer needed to make the hand.

Suppose West wins the heart and returns a diamond. Declarer takes the ace, discards the jack of diamonds on the good heart, and the contract is cold. Only two losers remain.

South can still make five without jeopardizing four. He can lead the queen of diamonds through East's king, and provide discards for two of his losing clubs. No risk is incurred by discarding a club if East does not cover the diamond queen.

At issue in this hand is the basic principle that a finesse wich endangers an otherwise sure contract should be ignored. The finesse is a valuable weapon to gain tricks, but it is an instrument that requires judicious use. It is not used merely because a finesse position exists.

Winning the contract is far more important than winning a finesse. Finessitis is all too prevalent a disease.

BEDTIME STORIES

Bobby Coon Is Blamed

Be slow to judge unless you must. Quick judgement tends to be unjust.

—Old Mother Nature.

Despiteth e loveliness of the moonlight the Green Forest was upset. That is to say, the folks who live in the Green Forest were upset. They had been upset all through the day previous. That was because hunters with dreadful guns had been hunting for the Grouse folk and Squirrel folk and the Rabbit folk. Every little while, all through the daytime a dreadful gun had banged through the Green Forest and on the Green Meadows. Only when the Black Shadows had come had there been a feeling of peace anywhere. And now that feeling was gone. A Dog and two hunters were in the Green Forest after Bobby Coon.

In running about trying to find Bobby Coon's trail the Dog had blundered onto Mrs. Grouse and sent her whirring off through the trees in great fright. The very fact that he was running around made other Green Forest folks uneasy. They couldn't be sure that Dog and those hunters were looking for only Bobby Coon. If they couldn't find Bobby it might be that they would hunt for some one else. Of course the furred and feathered folk had no way of knowing that a man made law forbade hunters to hunt anyone but Bobby Coon, or one of his family, in the night.

He had curled up every day in that tree for a long time.

Lightfoot the Deer, Mrs. Lightfoot, and the twins were all uneasy. So were all the Grouse folk. So was Jumper the Hare. So was Gray Fox. Happy Jack the Gray Squirrel, Rusty the Fox Squirrel and Chatterer the Red Squirrel were not at all worried. They may not even have known that those hunters were there, for they sleep through the night. If they were awakened by the barking of that Dog it didn't worry them.

As soon as it was certain that it was Bobby Coon those hunters were after over in the Green Forest all the folks that were so upset put all the blame on Bobby. They didn't stop to think that he had just as much reason for being out and about at night as they had. As a matter of fact Bobby had slept all day. He hadn't been bothered by the hunters through the day as the others had. He had been curled up in a hollow tree. He had curled up every day in that tree for a long time. All summer long he had come out at night to do his hunting and fishing. He did some through the day sometimes, but not much. He liked best the evening. Not until this night had he any reason to think he ever would be hunted at night. You see, the little people of the Green Forest know nothing of man-made law. So there was no way possible for Bobby Coon to know that for a certain season he would be hunted night after night.

So it was that Bobby Coon was blamed by all his neighbors for the fright and worry that night over in the Green Forest.

"If he had stayed abed it would-no' have happened," declared Lightfoot to Mrs. Lightfoot.

"It is all Bobby Coon's fault," said Thunderer the Grouse to Mrs. Grouse, when they had flown up in a hemlock tree where they couldn't be seen.

Not one of them thought how Bobby Coon himself must feel. It is dreadful to be hunted at any time. It is still more dreadful to be hunted when you have no idea just what to do.

Marchers Chant "Eden Must Go"

LONDON (CP)—More than 10,000 persons marched boldly down Whitehall to Prime Minister Eden's Downing street residence Sunday in protest against his Suez policy. They chanted "Eden must go", and many carried banners reading "Law not war."

It was a spontaneous, but anticipated, aftermath to a rally of some 20,000 Londoners in Trafalgar Square, sponsored by the Labor party which has denounced Eden's "police action" in Egypt. Other mass meetings are planned next week.

The marchers, many of them women with children, were turned back at Downing Street by several dozen mounted policemen and scores on foot. There were scattered skirmishes and a number of persons were taken to hospital. Twenty arrests were made.

BLAST FROM BEVAN

Earlier, on a makeshift platform beneath Nelson's monument, the Labor party's Aneurin Bevan roared:

"This is one of the largest demonstrations I have ever seen here. It shows the spontaneous indignation of the British people at Anthony Eden's policy in the Suez."

At first, the crowd was good-humored, although a young man who ignited a blue smoke bomb was roughed up by bystanders. Hundreds clambered on the walls of the National Gallery, and others watched from the steps of Canada House, a sombre, dark building overlooking the square.
