See In Every Hedgerow Marks Of Angels' Feet

This evening the lambskins ran races in the pasture with all the delight, it seemed, of as many children engaged in like play. And then when the shadows dimmed the hilltops and in the low of the valley, they came to nurse and cuddle down by their eyes, content to observe the rest of nightfall. Robins were at their evening, solemnly giving thanks for the favors of the day, and for this one so endearing, which had brought them up to week's close; thanks too returned for the dear fledgings and for the requirements of food, that would in good time set them on wing - "And be unimpaired, on behalf of humans" we heard aded, "to return thanks for the continuing peace we here in Island areas enjoy."

No color bar, we have to quarrel over - not actually. Island folks, by and large, are respectful of other people, other races and skills and knowledge wherever they are found. They believe in the right of an education for every child, who has the wish and will and ability to learn, in a limited or wider scope. Because after all, it may be the little "colored

"Oh dear" Mack had sighed once. "I wish I could come too. But" he conceded "I reckon I'd better take the morning off to review some of my school work."

"Pooze follow" James commented with a sigh. "But, it's as they used to say, 'The hotter the war, the sooner the peace!' After the end of the studying, come the holidays." "They will be welcome" Mack smiled.

The work of the farm. Folks follow its never-ending cycle. Walk its homely paths, day succeeding day. From sun-up until the dusk of twilight deepens into evening. The morning exercises have faded away. And we housewives performing the tasks of the day, washing the dishes, making our loaves, sweeping, ironing, and so on, have a heart to do them in the light of a privilege, a mission with which we have entrusted. So with the glory of the June-time aroused us, its sights and sounds to inspire us.

"Do the work that's nearest Tho' it dull at times, please let us meet them, Lame dogs over stilets.

See in every hedgerow Marks of angels' feet, Epics in every field, Endeavourments our feet." Until Monday Diary - Good-night--
