Prince Says That Grace Is Giving Up Her Acting Career

By CYNTHIA LOWRY
Associated Press Staff Writer

There are some cynics who have suggested that the graustark romance of Grace Patricia Kelly of Philadelphia and Rainier III, sovereign prince of Monaco, is another chapter in a book which might have been titled Jack Kelly's revenge. Miss Kelly, an Oscar-winning actress and a top movie star at the boxoffice by vote of film exhibitors, is giving up Hollywood next month to become Her Serene Highness. Princess Gracia of Monaco. Whether the parting will be permanent is not yet clear. The prince says it will, but his bride pointed out on her way to the wedding that she still has a contract with four years to run.

Re that as it may, when the vows are pronounced April 18 and the lovely Miss Kelly will become consort to one of the world's few remaining reigning monarchs, and will accumulate 23 other titles, ranging from duchess to baroness. All of this, the cynics maintain, can be taken as a method of showing an accomplish—even without a key breaking into Philadelphia's social register.

RILED BY HEART

Friends of the well-mannered, coolly-poised Miss Kelly scoff at this, however. They say she is a young lady who knows her own mind, who is ruled in this case by her heart and who is genuinely in love with her prince. The story of Jack Kelly's revenge begins more than 30 years ago when handsome, strapping John B. Kelly was collecting trophies as a champion sculler—a sport in which one man rows one small boat as fast as he can.

As an American champion, Kelly sought to race at famed Henley Regatta in England, but because he had once "worked with his hands" as a bricklayer, he was ruled ineligible for this "gentleman's" race. Kelly later was picked for the U.S. Olympic team, met and vanquished the Henley winner.

That was not the end. When B. Kelly Jr. came along, his father coached him, too, to championship status. In 1947, young "Kelly" went to Henley, qualified, and beat all comers.

THEATRICAL UNCLES

Meanwhile, the one-time bricklayer had built a borrowed $7,000 into one of the biggest brickwork construction companies. Two of his brothers went into the theatre. George Kelly, wrote plays. Another brother, Walter, was vaudeville's perennial favorite. "The Virginia Judge."

Big Jack married Grace Major, once a model and later a director of physical education at the University of Pennsylvania. They had four children: John B. Jr., Peggy, Grace and Lizanne. Grace was the athletic family.

The family grew up in a big house—well of the social main line—were marched with equal regularity off to the nearby Roman Catholic church on Sundays and the Penn Athletic Club for exercise.

MARY HAWORTH

Says Child Welfare Workers Strongly Favor Adoption

Dear Mary Haworth: We, the Volunteers of America, have (in the city from which I write) a maternity home for unwed mothers and a licensed adoption agency. As such, we handle hundreds of girls who have found themselves in the same situation as C.B.'s teenage daughter, whose plight was discussed in your column of February 15.

We feel qualified to express an opinion in the matter and we strongly disagree with your views. The paragraph to which we particularly object is as follows:

"I wonder what might be the long-term cost to the girl, in character and mental health and peace of soul, if she were to give up the child for adoption, hastily and furtively, in hopes of drawing a curtain on this part of her life forever—"

TAKES HEROISM

I think you will agree that every normal young woman who bears a child would like to keep it. It takes a good deal more character to give up a baby for its own best interest, than to keep it and subject it to the humiliation of illegitimacy.

Marriage to the baby's father is, of course, possible, but rarely wise. Unless both parties desire the union, it is almost sure to be a failure and the child will never have the security of normal family life. Children do not thrive emotionally in an atmosphere where there is no love and peace.

The modern trend in child welfare work is strongly towards adoption for the illegitimate child. Young couples who adopt children through licensed agencies have been proved by investigation and study to earnestly want them. Their marriages are solid and secure and they have all the requisites of good parenthood.

MOTHER ALONE

Any young mother who surrenders her child to a licensed agency for adoption can be very sure that she is giving her child the very best in life. She alone is the sufferer in making the sacrifice. This realization should bring peace of soul far beyond that attainable by any other course of action she might take.

We do agree with you, Miss Haworth, that the welfare of C.B.'s (anticipated) grandchild should be no less important to her than the happiness of her daughter. But we believe the child's welfare requires a happy, secure home with two emotionally mature (adopting) parents. The natural mother cannot offer her child this, even though she were to marry the father through representative statement:— Dear Mary Haworth: I've always been very interested in your column, but this is the first time I have been moved to write to you. We had a problem like C.B.'s in our family some years ago. We solved it in much the same manner as you have advised. Today we have an adorable five-year-old granddaughter, for whom we wouldn't take a million dollars. Ninety per cent of our friends proved they are really friends; and the others we get along very well without. Our daughter is now married to a fine young man who legally adopted the little girl, who now has a sister a year old. I wish I could say to all parents in this predicament, "Hold on to those dear little ones at any cost. You will never regret it." The only time I have nightmares is when I think of the possibility that we might have done otherwise. Most sincerely, D.M. Mary Haworth counsels through her column, not by mail or personal interview. Write to her in care of this newspaper.
