ELLEN'S DIARY

By An Island Farmer's Wife

Bringing the close of a week which has been blessed by more than one "growing shower" we suffered an electrical storm this afternoon - one, not at all heavy, as such are considered except in regard to the rain which continued for some time. We recall now that the trees on the lawn bent before the sudden onslaught of wind and down-pour, and rivulets ran down the driveway. Stealthily the storm advanced, though James appearing suddenly in the midst of our housework "had been just expecting this, Ellen. Didn't you notice the massing of clouds in the West? Better close the windows, Ellen. And the doors - though it may not amount to much."

Wash cut glass in hot soapsuds. Do not attempt to dry, but leave it to drain. After the air has dried it, rub briskly with a turkish towel, as this fabric does not leave lint and gets down into the cuts better than ordinary toweling.

DOROTHY DIX SAYS -

Too Much Talk

Foolish Arguments Cause Many A Domestic Rift

A large proportion of the marriages whose obsequies take place in the divorce courts are talked to death. This may seem a strange saying to newlyweds, who cherish the artless belief that husbands and wives should tell each other everything and talk over together every detail of their lives.

This is a swell theory, and it would work if any two people ever saw eye to eye and had the same tastes and habits and opinions and points of view. Unfortunately, this is not the case and especially it is not the case when one of the parties is of the male persuasion and the other of the female. No man and woman ever yet thought alike, or got exactly the same slant on a subject, and so it is inevitable that when a husband and wife discuss every detail of every trivial and inconsequential domestic episode, they turn marriage into nothing but a debating society.

Of course, rational human beings, and especially those who love each other, should be able to discuss any question that is before the house, whether it is religion or politics or the mixing of a salad dressing, in a calm and temperate manner and reach an amicable agreement. But again, unfortunately, such is not the case. The minute people begin to argue about a matter, that minute their temperatures begin to rise, their voices take on an edge and they commence hunting around in their minds for words and phrases that will stab like stiletos.

Nine-tenths of the family quarrels that end in wrecked homes begin in foolish arguments over things as unimportant as what color a room shall be painted, the kind of automobile they shall buy, the movies they shall attend, or whether spinach is edible or not, whether the wife shall use cosmetics and the husband go to a baseball game or not.

We have only to assist, as the French say, at the average domestic fight to perceive that it was precipitated by too much talk. If the husbands and wives would only go along and do what they want to do without discussing it beforehand, it would be accepted as a matter of course and there would be no row over it. It is when every move, and even what they think has to be thrashed out in endless argument that one or the other is sure to say the fighting word.

Of the folly of husbands and wives telling each other of every episode in their past lives, too much cannot be said. It is the act of a moon in yet intelligent men and women do it without apparently realizing that they are blighting the happiness of their mates and putting in their mates' hands a weapon with which to slay them. For in marriage it is literally true that what one doesn't know doesn't trouble one. Whereas knowing something that hurts is a wound in the heart that never ceases to throb with pain.

Anyway what's done is done. It cannot be changed, so what is the good in telling of romantic adventures and former loves when all that it accomplishes is to sow the seeds of doubt in a wife's or husband's heart and poison her or his soul with jealousy? Many a woman drives her husband away from home by talking too much about her domestic affairs. Her whole conversational gamut runs from the nursery to the kitchen and back again, and that is full fodder for a man to feed on who is hungry for some tasty bit of gossip, or some stimulating and amusing talk about books or plays or world affairs.

WHINING WOMEN

And there are plenty of women who meet tired and exhausted men, who have been battling all day against discouraging business conditions, with a recital of every detail of what has gone wrong in the home during the day. They whine and complain about how much trouble the children are, and how long they have stood over the stove preparing the dinner, and discourse about the high cost of everything, and generally pitch in great gobs of gloom to add to the depression until the poor man flees from his home as soon as he gets his dinner, as he would from a morgue.

Women lose out in marriage because they talk to their husbands about their wrongs. Some evil genius has led the average wife to believe that it is her sacred duty to tell her husband of his faults. That is her undoing. She tells him that he is getting fat and bald. She reminds him of his every fault and fable and then she wonders why he wanders off to some woman who tells him how young and handsome and wonderful he is.

And women make the fatal mistake of telling their husbands of all the blunders they themselves commit, thereby depreciating themselves in their husbands' eyes. They never realize that all a husband ever knows about his wife is what she tells him herself, and that as long as she represents herself as a paragon he believes her to be one.
