ELLEN'S DIARY

Magic Is So Common In The Cycle Of The Seasons

As each day comes to us in turn in the cycle of the seasons, and the years, we increasingly find that "The universe is a perpetual miracle."

Not only, we may say, in the realms beyond this immediate world of ours, bound by the line fences and the horizons near and farther-for instance in space exploration, and in scientific objectives accomplished which can confine in a small space, enough energy to turn great turbines of industry— or destroy at one fell sweep " the earth and the fullness thereof."

But in the everyday things, the so-called common sights, and sounds of the daily round, which depend in goodly measure for farm-folks on the season at hand, it is here we find the magic. Every day brings its different charms, and all so lovely. Today the rosy hue in the maples' tops in the grove over the fields, and tucked in here and there in the wooelands about, seemed to be deepening in the sunlight. And above the far fields in the high sunny sky, a jet wrote its name in a vapored trail in the known blue. Beyond it, a plane all shining silver; like some great butterfly out of a fairy tale was content to fly a more leisurely course. And for us fetching wood to the box at the time, and going on then, alone as it happened, to the barns, this was a marvellous day.

The younger farmer was missing then from the stables, he having gone to tend the cattle and sheep wintering at the far barns. But James was there, all aware for a minute of the audience watching, as he cleaned one of the cow-kind in her stall. He brushed vigorously in a left-hand sweep, steadily bringing out the sheen in her coat.

He looked up and smiled.

"They do say, Ellen" he offered "a good cleaning does more for an animal than an extra feed of grain!"

He stood back to survey his handiwork. "It certainly improves the appearance" he nodded.

More interesting now the herd grows, in this the natural time of the increase. New and young faces appear. You see the calves, the cute daughters, and the sturdy sons of the herd, look up inquiringly at you, from the shelter of their dams. And always in a display of motherly concern that is most heart-warming, she moves casually but surely between the small one and any visitor who comes.

A sun-spread morning favors the baking, and this one gave us time to try a new recipe.

"Never attempt to bake anything new when you are pressed for time. You will be disappointed at the result. Better stick to the tried and proven recipes then!" a good cook advises.

"And what's that, Ellen?" James queried of the squares we served as a sweet at supper. He helped himself to a piece and eyed it with some curiosity. "I never saw anything look like that" he observed. He ventured to taste it. "Why, it's good!" he smiled.

Good too this winter-day was, as sunshine spread, it carried us on toward the springtime-days.

Until tomorrow — Diary — Good-night.

MARY HAWORTH

Debt Is "Steady's" Excuse For No Marriage Proposal

Dear Mary Haworth: I have been going steady with Joe for a year and I still see no signs of wedding bells. He insists he would like to marry me but is too deeply in debt at present.

I am 24 and he is going on 29 and I would like to have things clarified. He is the youngest in his family and feels he has a lifetime to do things. He is always saying, "If I can't get it done this year. I'll get it done next."

Joe, his father and two older sisters all have very good jobs. The family bought a very expensive house three years ago and all agreed in advance to stick together in paying it off. When I ask Joe how long his family expects him to help out, he simply says: "I don't know."

In 17 years, the house will be paid for; and I asked if they expect him to stay single until then. Again he just said he did not know. I certainly think something could be worked out if only he would discuss it with them. I feel where there's a will there's a way.

As Joe is the only son and especially close to his mother, I sometimes feel he is only using the house as an excuse because he doesn't want to leave her. I don't insist on his marrying me this minute but I would like to know when he will be free. I would sincerely appreciate your advice.—E.E.

Dear E.E.: In my opinion you are wasting your youth, waiting around for Joe to marry you. He simply isn't disposed to marry, period.

He probably likes you a lot; enough to marry you if he had any intentions of getting married in the next 10, 15 or 20 years. But he hasn't. As you surmise, he is content with his role of mama's boy; and you are just the icing on the cake.

If you ever had a chance to sweep Joe off his feet, into a sudden contract, you began to throw it away when you took the initiative in pressing your suit and started giving him the third degree about his present and future intentions.

The antidote to your mistake is to cut down on your dates with Joe and get back in the social swim with other eligible men.

If and when you are busy with a full dating schedule, forgetting Joe in other men's company, he may decide he can't live without you and commit himself to a marriage proposal.

Yet even if he doesn't, still it is important to your well-being to get out of this situation in which you are trying to become his wife, while he is tactily rejecting the idea.—M.H.

Dear Mary Haworth: What's wrong with a man who treats his wife like a mother or sister, and seems to expect her to accept that role while he cavorts amorously with other women? He has no time to sit and talk with his wife, not even once in a while, during an evening of dancing, as other husbands do. Instead he holds the other women close, looks deeply into their eyes and pays them gallant compliments, with never any praise for his wife.

It hurts her, as can be seen by the sad look on her face and in her eyes. Yet he says she is jealous if she complains. What do you think? I, for one, feel like telling him to go jump in the lake when he comes to ask me for a dance.—V.B.

Dear V.B.: You are describing a male who lacks virility; who is neurotically inadequate in love and sex relatedness; and who is trying, by his gay blade performance, to give the lie to this sad truth. He needs psychiatric help to catch up with his age.—M.H.
