THE DAILY EXAMINER.

AUGUST 12, 1892.

The Initial Step.

THE first movement in the shifting scene of British politics has been completed. In this movement the dexterity of "the old Parliamentary hand" was apparent. Mr. Gladstone was in good health and good form. His speech upon the motion of want of confidence was admittedly as clever and powerful as those of his earlier years. In the light of his criticism it is evident that the leaders of the other party made a technical mistake in not resigning as soon as they discovered that the majority was not at their backs. It appears, by the meagre reports which have been received, that Mr. Gladstone challenged the right of his opponents to raise a question as to the composition of the Liberal majority, and said that such a course was a blow at the root of the constitution. What if the Liberal majority had Irish votes for its basis—that was in his opinion, rather a recommendation than a ground for assailing the right of such a majority to represent the people. Is it or is it not a fact that the judgment of a nation is without appeal to Parliament? Is the House of Commons to fight over again the battle of the last six years? Never has there been a great issue submitted to the country that had been so fully discussed as the issue decided at the last general election. The government was perfectly aware of that fact. They knew well that the majority of the House had come prepared to give effect to the verdict of their constituents. The claims of Ireland had been for years at the fore front of the battle. The principles of his Home Rule bill were well known. By its provisions there would be a full and effectual maintenance of imperial supremacy, while Ireland would be given the conduct of her own affairs. Irish representation in the House of Commons was also contemplated under certain conditions. As to the form in which these principles would be embodied, it was the duty of the Liberals to accept the best form, but not until they had been placed in power. The verdict of the country had shown that the people meant home rule to be prominent. Consequently, the result of the election should at once have been accepted. Proceeding, Mr. Gladstone declared that the coercion bill ought not to be retained on the statute book longer than required by Parliamentary usage; and he complained that the Government had inflicted on Ireland a gross wrong in making her a pretended reparation by a local government bill too limited to satisfy Irish wants. The Home Rule Bill has, for seven years had his primary and absorbing attention and would continue to have it to the end. If the measure passed the House of Commons, never would the House of Lords have before them a question of greater importance to the Empire at large, never a question of greater importance to themselves. Referring to the Conservative argument, that the Irish majority was trying to coerce England, Mr. Gladstone held that such was the strength of England in relation to the other kingdoms that she never could be coerced by them. England had a giant's strength, he said, but let her not use it like a giant.

Though technically right, Lord Salisbury put himself somewhat in the wrong—in view of recent precedents—when he declined to accept at once the verdict of a majority the electorate declared at the polls; and his graat antagonist has been quick to take advantage of the slip. If Lord Salisbury had resigned before the meeting of Parliament, Mr. Gladstone would now be bearing the responsibilities of office, and instead of having the opportunity to criticise, might now be criticised. In view of the jarring opinions and jealousies of the Parnellites and anti Parnellites, and the unrequited ambitions resulting from the formation of a Cabinet, it is possible that a powerful criticism at this juncture might annoy if not weaken him. But there can be no question that the Liberal leader has in the beginning scored a parliamentary triumph, and may now, all the more confidently, proceed to the formation of a Ministry.

—Finally it has been decided that the grant by Congress of $5,000,000 in aid of the World's Fair shall be contingent upon the closing of the fair on Sundays.

—The number of journalists in the new British Parliament is no less than thirty five, counting under that head proprietors of newspapers as well as those who write for them. Of these, twenty-two are English, thirteen Irish. The Irish, on the other side, as in America, seem to have a natural tendency toward printer's ink.

—In reply to a question, Mr. Hugh McLennan, one of the oldest and most experienced men in the trade of Montreal, spoke as follows concerning the canal tolls matter:

"The Government made the concession to the trade some years ago on representation of the difficulty they were under to compete with the free canals of the United States, and I do not suppose they would act as they have done now unless they saw the expediency of it. It is, no doubt, a serious matter to the trade of the St. Lawrence, but the Government may see their way clear to make free canals when they have time to take up the question. I think any criticism on the course adopted by the Government at this point would be premature, inasmuch as we are not conversant with the further intentions of the Government in the matter of this international question."

Notes and Comments.

—We congratulate the Moncton Times upon the completion of its fifteenth year.

—Montreal Gazette: Mars has a canal question too, but it is bothering only the astronomers. Mars should be happy.

—There has been ten months' trade with Cuba under the reciprocity treaty with the United States. In that period (ending June 30 last) were sold to Cuba $16,095,468 worth of American products, farm and manufactured, against only $10,393,271 sold in the ten months previous to the treaty—a gain of $5,702,187, or over half a million increase a month. In the same time the purchases of non-competing products from Cuba were $64,374,088, against $52,539,117, a gain of $11,834,965. These figures prove that the Republican policy of reciprocity is widening the foreign market for American products.

—Confronted with the fact that there are as many insane among the women as among the men, by the fact that fewer women drink to excess, and by the conclusion that "the use of liquor is not a potent cause of insanity," Dr. Steeves says: "This conclusion is based on an unstable, if not a rotten, foundation. I think I may speak with some certain knowledge, when I affirm that women drink more than is generally supposed; and secondly, that in the affairs of life which try the human soul sorely and bring to grief the nervious centres, women, with her power of resistance, have immeasureably the greater load to bear."

— A correspondent writes:—

"Will you please inform an old subscriber, through the columns of your paper, whether there is or is not a law on our statute books rendering the owner liable to a fine for allowing geese to run at large on the streets of Charlottetown. A flock of geese is to be seen on the street at the head of Pownal wharf, from Sunday morning until Saturday night. These geese are owned by a man well known to the police, and yet these officers of the law pass these birds from day to day and take no notice of them This morning I had to pick my way along the platform on Water Street, to avoid stepping on the droppings of these birds. The streets of this city are dirty enough, God knows, without being made worse by tolerating the nuisance above referred to. Besides, these things make a bad impression on the many strangers visiting our city at this season of the year."

The authorities will, of course, attend to this matter.

—The carrying of the $20,000,000 of gold coin belonging to the Government across the country from San Francisco to New York in a special train is an unprecedented event in the affairs of the Treasury Department, but it is apparently not a matter of great moment or significance. The treasure is being transferred from the Western mint to the Sub-Treasury. It consists of five-dollar and ten-dollar pieces and is packed in 500 boxes. These are placed in two wrought steel freight cars, bomb proof A unique feature of the shipment is that each box is a registered mail package, and a body of armed officers are accompanying it. There is always an over-supply of gold in the San Francisco treasury, and the recent exports from New York have drained the government coffers there to a low ebb Henry Clews is reported to have said:

"The transfer is not of particular importance. It is made probably because the government fears that possibly there may be some uneasiness here on account of the heavy shipments from here to Europe later on, but there will be none, we think. London, in spite of its protestations to the contray, is buying and the current will turn back to us before long. There will be no scare."

— When Schiaparelli made his famous map of Mars, showing the so-called canal system, it is within the bounds of possibility that what he observed was a signal service devised by the scientific residents of that planet to attract attention on the earth. The astronomers participating in the present craze cannot find any trace of the Schiaparelli parallel lines, but what, it may be asked, was to have prevented the people in Mars from removing them in the meantime, seeing that no result came of their enterprise? How were they to know that the scientists of the earth were all the while cudgelling their brains to open up communication from this end? Sir Francis Galton thinks there is yet some life in the old project to throw flashes from mirrors upon Mars. Not forgetting also the favorite scheme of geometrical figures, it is not imprudent to say that the resources of human ingenuity for achieving the end desired have not yet been exhausted. For instance, if a great choir of singers were to be gathered in some obscure and wild region, where they would not be likely to disturb the rest of the world, and if they would persist in singing Tra-ra-ra-boom-de-aye, Annie Rooney, or some equally popular ditty, that might fetch them. It is hardly possible that Mars could stand it.

— The story from Berlin that General Caprivi thinks of resigning the post of Chancellor of the German Empire is without official indorsement, and pet has elements of probability. When the German Emperor a few months ago decided to abandon the Prussian Education Bill in deference to the evident and strongly aroused sentiment of the majority of his people, Chancellor Caprivi then resigned the office of Premier of Prussia. It was reported at the time on very good authority that General Caprivi also presented his resignation as Chancellor, and wished to retire from office altogether, believing that his prestige had been injured by the Emperor's change of front on the Education Bill, the Chancellor having committed himself to the measure. General Caprivi was induced, however, to retain the office of Chancellor, the surrender of which would have seriously embarrassed the Emperor. Affairs appear to have gone along smooth until the recent outbreak of Prince Bismarck The Prince evidently believed Caprivi responsible for the slights to which he was subjected at the hands of the Viennese court and aristocracy, and Bismarck was probably right. Bismarck's angry and caustic comments on the situation at Berlin so provoked Caprivi that he made it to be understood, through the official press, that the ex-Chancellor would be prosecuted. When Wilhelm returned from his tour to Norway, Caprivi, it is said, pressed upon his master the prosecution of Bismarck, urging that the proposed step was due both to the Emperor and to his Ministers. The Emperor certainly did not order a prosecution, and Caprivi was again disappointed. Under such conditions there is very likely to be truth in the story of General Caprivi's intended resignation. Indeed, it would be strange if he should remain in office as the nominal chief adviser of a sovereign who has twice ignored his judgment in matters of the gravest importance. Should General Caprivi retire his successor would probably be the present Premier, Count Von Eulenburg, who while an able manager and far from contemptible as a statesman, is a thorough devotee of the imperial "Ego."

Obituary.

A correspondent writes:—"A sad event occurred at Cornwall, on Aug. 4th, in the death of Elizabeth Mullally, relict of the late Richard Leonard, in the 67th year of her age. After an illness of about six weeks of disease of the brain, God mercifully called her to Himself. The deceased was a most zealous and faithful Catholic, and a devoted wife and mother. Though passing through a sea of affliction in the death of her husband and a number of her children, she ever recognized the hand of her Heavenly Father, and bore all the trials which fell to her lot with a resigned and patient faith. Her last days were filled with that peace which comes of a well-spent life. By her many friends her loss will be deeply felt, while in the home she loved and worked for the place of the gentle loving mother can never be filled. Her memory will be fondly cherished by the children who survive her, and may her soul rest happily in God."

Oddfellows' Statistics.

Grand Secretary Frazee's report at the recent meeting shows the increase in membership for the year to be close to the largest, and also the largest per centum of any for sixteen years. The lodge initiating the largest number is Amity of Halifax, which initiated eighty-two during the year, now the largest lodge in the jurisdiction, numbering 239 members. The number of lodges per last report was forty-seven. The present number, fifty-one. The number of members per last report, 3 270 The number initiated during the year, 790; total increase, 895; total decrease, 375; net increase, 520. The membership now is 3,790; degrees conferred, 2,127; number of weeks' benefit paid, 1 430; number of widowed families relieved, 48; amount paid for relief of members, $3,643 21; total relief, $5,052 53; total expenditure for the year, $18,630.31. The average receipts per member was $6 88; average expenses per member. $3.86; average relief, $1.45.

Hurled into Eternity.

A special despatch to the Halifax Herald gives additional particulars of the awful death of Miss McKenzie, reported yesterday:—

"There was a swish of skirts through the air, a half articulate cry of fear, followed by the dreadful thud of a heavy falling body from number one elevator shaft in the Exchange building. A dozen men rushed to the spot and peered in horror through the gratings. At the bottom of the shaft lay the body of a young woman, bleeding and senseless, in a ghastly heap. The fatal elevator had claimed one more victim. It was an accident of a peculiarly painful nature, and to-day that great human hive, the Exchange building, 53 State Street feels the hush of subdued horror. In the twinkling of an eye a young girl in the very plentitude of life was hurled to eternity. No one is to blame. It was sheer carelessness on the part of the victim. Her name was Miss Belle McKenzie, of Pictou, and she was employed as a stenographer and type-writer in the office of stock broker James S. Warden, of room 511. She came from N. S. where her parents are living. Three girl chums are taking care of her affairs until relatives, who have been notified by telegraph, can arrive. Miss McKenzie was an estimable girl, cool and methodical in habit. It has been her custom to go to the office early, open up and sort the mail, and generally make ready for the day. She arrived at the building at 8 30 o'clock this morning, and entered the elevator nearest the State street entrance. William Kneith was the young man in charge. At the fifth floor, where Mr. Warden's office is, the car stopped and a man got off. Miss McKenzie was standing in a little group of passengers, and as she struggled forward Kneith slid the door to and started the car upward. Miss McKenzie caught the door with one hand and tried to step off, but the car had got under full headway. Her foot slipped and in an instant she had disappeared feet first through the space between the car step and the outer door, which is about two feet wide. With a scream she was precipitated past five floors and the basement, striking on her head on the metal-sheathed bottom of the shaft. A crowd gathered in a few minutes about the basement and the big firemen on duty there tenderly lifted the inert form. Her pulses were still beating, but consciousness had departed, and soon even the feeble flutter of life ceased and she was dead. Miss McKenzie was a pretty girl of 24 years. She wore a a blue skirt and light waist, the latter garment being splashed with her blood. Her skull was fearfully crushed by the tremendous fall.

Queer Politics.

(From Harper's Weekly.)

The record of the two Houses of Congress as to the silver question is a very different one, and is a curious and interesting lesson in the complexity of American politics. The Senate, with a majority of Republicans, whose party, by the voice of its official chief, the President, and by the formal declarations of all its recognized leaders, was committed against free coinage, has twice during the session passed a free coinage bill once before and once after the action of the National Conventions. The House, on the contrary, with a majority of Democrats, some two-thirds at least of whom were in favor of free coinage, has each time rejected the bill passed by the senate. But when the votes in the two branches are analyzed, the remarkable result is found that the Democrats passed the bill in the Senate each time, and the Republicans each time defeated it in the House. The causes of this complicated condition of things are too many to be recounted here. It is enough to note that the evidence is strong that there is no general and steady sentiment for free silver in the nation, and that the votes in Congress have been determined largely by local conditions in limited portions of the republic. But it would be unjust to omit a tribute of profound respect and gratitude to the "honest money Democrats" in the House, without whom the disgrace and disaster involved in the passage of a free silver bill could not have been avoided.

SIR CHARLES EUAN-SMITH AND THE PRESENT CONDITION OF AFFAIRS IN MOROCCO.

The Tangier correspondent of the London Times says:—

"In an interview to-day Sir Charles Euan-Smith declared that the recent sensational reports issued by the Central News Company in regard to his mission to Fez, especially those detailing the conversation between the Sultan and himself, were greatly exaggerated.

"Sir Charles declared that he did not use the bombastic language attributed to him on that occasion, and that he did not tear up the treaty upon being offered a bribe after discovering that it had been tampered with. He further declared that he did not throw the pieces of the torn treaty at Sid Charnet out of the mission quarters.

"Sir Charles added that the diplomatic relations between Great Britain and Morocco had not been broken off, and that the negotiations for a treaty had not been abandoned. His farewell of the Sultan was of the most cordial description.

"The feeling in the country, said Sir Charles, is in favor of a treaty, and he is daily receiving letters from rich and influential Moors regretting that he had not obtained the treaty."

"The correspondent adds: 'The Sultan's soldiers are robbing the people by wholesale near Tangier. The Moorish Foreign Minister and the Basha of Tangier say that they are powerless to protect the people. The Sultan is determined to exterminate the rebels, and the innocent must suffer with the guilty.'"
