British Flower Growers Bid For Canadian Market

By JOHN E. BIRD
Canadian Press Staff Writer

OTTAWA (CP)—British flower growers are making a major effort to cut into the virtual monopoly enjoyed by the United States in the export of flowers to Canada.

The British growers are banking on fast air transportation and improved insulated containers to increase their sales of flowers to Canada, particularly in the winter months.

Canadian imports of cut flowers and foliage used for decorative purposes were valued at $1,599,283 in 1957, compared with $1,423,057 in 1956 and $1,136,018 in 1955.

MUCH MORE FROM U.S.

U.S. shipments in 1957 amounted to $1,556,794, as against $5,463 from Britain. In 1956 exports from the U.S. were valued at $1,388,869, compared with British shipments of $1,264, and in 1955 American sales amounted to $1,109,043, as against $212 for Britain.

The principal flowers imported by Canada incluke chrysanthemums, orchids, gladiolus, roses and carnations. Cut foliage imports include salvia, huckleberry and several other types used in flower bouquets.

The increase in British sales of cut flowers and foliage between 1955 and 1957 continued in th first three months of 1958. Total imports in the period were valued at $491,502, with U.S. sales totalling $473,957 and British sales amounting to $2,708.

British growers enjoy a tariff advantage over their competitors in the U.S. The duty on American flowers and foliage is 12½ per cent while they are admitted free under the British preferential tariff.

EAST LOOKS BEST

The Eastern Canadian market appears the most attractive to the British growers. They say the distance from California — the main American supply area—is about the same as from Britain.

So far British growers have shipped only hardy blooms—roses anemones and carnations which are able to stand the long ocean flight.

The chief problem at present is that flowers are severely chilled during the Atlantic flight and when they are unloaded at Canadian airports in winter. This is not as great a problem with American exporters as their flowers are not subject to the cold for so long a period.

The British growers have developed a satisfactory insulated carton but it is small in size and costly. They hope a better method can be found for the air shipment of all types of flowers so they can take advantage of an expanding Canadian market.

Tablet Scare Was Groundless Officials Feel

Red Cross Water Safety officials were thrown into a panic Saturday afternoon when it was reported that a seven year old boy at the Kiwanis Swimming Pool had been seen swallowing chlorine tablets used to disinfect the water in the pool.

After a frantic search for the youngster and an appeal broadcast over the local radio station,, no one was reported suffering from the effects accompanying the taking of such pills.

Red Cross officials are convinced that the 11-year-old boy who reported the younger lad "eating pills' was either mistaken or what he actually saw him eating was candy.

Officials in charge of the swimming pool state that chlorine tablets are placed in a plastic bag and hung in the water of the pool at the deepest part.
