DENTISTRY.

THE cry of "Hard times" and "No money" is universal. Yet people lose their teeth, and in consequence their health. Again, recent improvements have cheapened the cost of Dental material;—considering which I have decided to reduce my prices, and for three months from the date of this I will make a set of teeth for Ten Dollars. Parts of sets correspondingly cheap. More than this—I will use good material and guarantee, in every case, a perfect fit.

Hunter's Grave.

A STORY OF PIONEER LIFE IN P. E. ISLAND.

(CONCLUDED.)

The father blamed himself for encouraging Hunter to choose the perilous life of a soldier. As for poor Marion she shed many bitter tears when she reflected that she made no effort to prevent her lover leaving her on his dangerous mission. But time and health works wonders. She was now a strong, healthy woman, who had no thought of wasting her time in day dreams. Her mind and body was kept busy in doing, as much as possible, for her father's comfort and enjoyment. Two years after Hunter left Rustico, a ship arrived in the harbour from England. She was sent by the proprietor of Lot 23 for a cargo of pine lumber which lumbermen had been preparing all winter. The proprietor's son, a young man of twenty-one years of age, came as a passenger to see what his father's estate in the Island was like. His name was William Cormick. He had a fine, prepossessing appearance, and the education and manners of a gentleman.

As Whittier's home was the only place for miles around in which the English language was spoken or understood, of course Cormick was a constant visitor there. Whittier was delighted with his new friend, and no wonder, for twenty-five years he had not seen a man who could comprehend what he had suffered for his loyalty to the British empire. Cormick was just the sort of a man to ingratiate himself into his favour. He had a good knowledge of English politics, and was strongly imbued with the idea that whatever the British Government did was right. To Marion his was more fascinating still. He could talk of things going on in the world of which she had heard little and seen nothing. He studiously aimed to please the gentle girl, and he succeeded well, for she soon began to look on him as an ideal of what a man should be. It must be remembered that during all this time nothing was heard of Hunter and his fortunes. At length the ship was loaded and ready for sea, and Cormick had to part with his friends. This he did reluctantly. Marion's beauty and simple manners made a deep impression on him. In fact he was deeply in love with her. He, however, had to leave, promising to return in the ship in the next spring. After his departure, Marion strove to forget him and to think of the long absent Arthur. But in spite of her endeavors, the well-informed, polished gentleman would come to her thoughts. Winter came, and spring followed winter, and nothing was heard from Arthur Hunter. In the early days of June the lumber ship was seen in the offing. She was soon in the harbor; and, in a few hours, Cormick was at Whittier's fireside. He brought papers with him from his father, appointing Whittier an agent to manage the estate on the Island. As for himself, he had liberty to stay on the Island all winter or return in the ship to England. Before the ship was ready for sea he decided to remain, and poor Hunter's dream was sealed. Whittier soon discovered that his daughter and Cormick loved each other. And believing that the match would be a happy one for his daughter and that Hunter was dead, he threw no impediments in the way. He considered his daughter good enough to be the wife of any man, and Cormick worthy of any man's daughter. If Arthur Hunter had come back at this stage, things might have turned out differently. But it is old saying, out of sight out of mind; and the man who stays away four years from the woman he loves while he has a rival who is always on hand to pour love's soft tale into her ears, stands a poor chance. At any rate, such was the case in this instance. Marion Whittier and William Cormick were engaged to be married, and the time appointed for the marriage ceremony was the following Christmas.

The event would have taken place sooner, but there was no clergyman to perform the marriage rite. They had to wait until a missionary Priest of the Catholic Church, who annually visited the Acadians then settled round the Island, came to Rustico, which he did every Christmas. Christmas came; and the Priest on his annual round. The ceremony was duly performed, and Arthur Hunter was apparently forgotten by all. But he was only apparently forgotten. Marion could not forget on her bridal day, the man who won her first young love. It seemed as if a hundred things unnoticed before that day, brought his once-loved form to her remembrance.
Our narrative left Arthur Hunter dangerously wounded after the battle of Lundy's Lane. His life was for a long time despaired of, but youth and a good constitution did what no doctor could do; and he slowly recovered. After the war was over every town and hamlet of Canada vied with each other in doing honor to the brave men who volunteered to the front in defence of home and country. Hunter with his brother officers was present at many a gay assemblage of Canadian beauties. Many a fair Canadian damsel's bosom heaved while treading the mazy dance with Arthur. But he never swerved in his allegiance to the fair brown eyed maid he had left in Prince Edward Island. As soon as possible he took passage in a sloop of war for Halifax expecting easily to find his way from there to his adopted home at Whittier's. While on the voyage the sloop was overtaken by a French frigate and although they fought bravely they were overpowered by the frigate and taken prisoners. They were landed on the Island of St. Pierie, where they were detained prisoners until the war with France was over. At length in the year of 1815 he was set at liberty and sent with a few other Islanders in a small schooner to East Point where they arrived in the month of December. From there he started at once for Rustico with his heart full of high hopes and glowing anticipations of his darling Marion's joy on seeing him safely returned.

He had a long and wearisome march, most of the way through the trackless forest. After suffering untold hardships on his journey in that inclement season of the year, he arrived a Whittier dwelling on the very night that Marion Whittier and William Cormick were married. He entered the house where he had spent so many happy years of his boyhood without a knock. Whittier and his daughter knew him at the first glance, but they looked upon him as an apparition from the grave and they were speechless with fear and astonishment. Marion sat staring at him with a deathly pallor in her face and when he moved towards her with his hand extended, she waved him away with such an imploring look that he realized that something was wrong. Although no words were spoken Hunter comprehended the situation. The Priest at the table, the gay attire, Marion and the stranger sitting side by side, convinced him that he no longer had a claim on Marion Whittier; and he turned and left the house forever. From that moment no human eye ever saw Arthur Hunter alive. After Marion recovered from the stupor into which the appearance of the lover of her young days had thrown her, she insisted on the whole party going to look for him and induce him to come back. The night turned out bitter cold and stormy. But Marion felt no cold. Nor did she heed the raging storm. All night long did she lead the party in search of the lover of her youth. In vain did she call him by the endearing name by which she used to call him in the old days when she plighted to him her troth. The hollow wind, moaning through the forest, seemed to mock her despairing cry. No trace of Hunter could be found, and they had to return to the house a sad and gloomy bridal party. In the following Spring a party of lumbermen found the body of a man in the heart of the forest. On investigation it proved to be the body of the ill-fated Arthur Hunter. A rough coffin was made for it by the lumbermen, and he was buried on the spot where he was found.

Such, reader, is the simple story of Hunter's grave. It is not well told. But some P. E. Island genius may yet weave the incidents of the story into as fascinating a romance as was ever traced to the pen of Walter Scott.

The Chinese Question.

WHAT THE NEW YORK "SUN" SAYS.

"The Chinese must go!" is the cry that is heard not in California only, but the world over wherever they have settled in considerable numbers. Such is the case in British Columbia, New Zealand, New South Wales, Australia and the Sandwich Islands. They come to these countries without wives or families, live (closely packed together) on the cheapest food that will sustain life, save all the money they can with a view to returning to China with their earnings as soon as they can, and being thus enabled to work at lower prices than native workmen possibly can, soon obtain a monopoly of one department of labor after the other. In New Zealand they have been set to work upon the railroads, but have been driven away by the white laborers. In New South Wales the cabinet making trade has passed entirely into their hands, and they are taking the place of white cooks and servants in the hotels.

THE MAN WITH A WIFE AND SIX CHILDREN, WHO NEVER SAW ONE OF THEM.—A genuine Yankee in San Francisco having bored a new-comer with every conceivable question relative to his object in visiting the gold country, his hopes, his means and his prospects, at length asked him if he had a family.

"Yes, sir; I have a wife and six children, and I never saw one of them."

After this reply the couple sat a few minutes in silence, when the interrogator again commenced:—"Was you ever blind, sir?"

"No, sir."

"Did you marry a widow, sir?"

"No, sir."

Another interval of silence.

"Did I understand you to say, sir, that you had a wife and six children living in New York, and had never seen one of them?"

"Yes, sir; I so stated it."

Another and a longer pause. Then the interrogator again inquired:—"How can it be, sir, that you never saw one of them?"

"Why," was the response, "one of them was born after I left."

Curate (visiting poor cabman, down with bronchitis—"Have you been in the habit of going to church?") Poor cabby (faintly)—"Can't say I hev, sir; but (eagerly) I hev druv a good many parties there, sir!"
