Table Top

by Eden Phillpotts
CHAPTER X
ARE THEY SIGNALS?

The island looked like a small, black slug crawling with lifted horns along the edge of a purple sea. But above the twin peaks that ascended to the south there hung a heavy cloud of vapour spreading fanwise and dimming the glory of the western sky.

Night quickly hid Tabletop, but significant phenomena attended the darkness. The island revealed its own pharos, for, like some light-house mightily uplifted, a dull red glare outlined the crown of the crater when night fell. It was no steadfast solitary gleam, but a pervasive glow cast up from the black earth into the starry sky—a light such as blazes from the furnace door when it is flung open.

St. Paul's Sunday School meets tomorrow morning at 10 o'clock. All members are urged to be present. New members will receive a cordial welcome.
ST. PETER'S CATHEDRAL Church School resumes classes tomorrow at 10 A. M. All boys and girls from 3 to 16 years of age will be most welcome.

It will be hot—how hot we don't know. Old Pedro Floris said the water under the woods was wholesome, but not cold.
"Are they signals?" he said. "So they must be pretty big. And I believe they're yellow."
Air more fiery than any they had yet breathed drifted to them from the land, and Tom noted it.
"This is going to be a Turkish bath," he said. "The heat ashore must be terrific; but we're tuned up to high temperatures by this time. Only we shan't feel tremendously energetic when we land."
The forest spread over the entire eastern fringes of the island in one uniform sheet of sulky green touched here and there with colour. It extended to within a hundred yards of the sea and the intervening space was cinder black.

Beyond the forest, ruled in a harsh, stark line across the rising ground, was a band that marked the end of any vegetation; but while beneath it the green persisted, growing denser as it reached sea level, above it only livid crags and precipices of volcanic rock arose to the central tableland of the island. Maine judged the crater to be four miles in diameter.
"A tremendous vapour rises out of it," he said, after a survey through Costa's telescope, "but there's no lava moving on this side any way. It may have a vent to the westward."
They spent that day in cruising slowly round the varied shores of Tabletop. The prevailing silence of the islet impressed Jane and also depressed her.

"The yellow birds on the tops of the trees flit about slowly, but they are dumb," she said. "Everything seems to be dumb and silent, as if invisible life was listening and hiding and hardly daring to move."
"I will fire a gun," answered Pardo.
He fetched a rifle and fired towards the land. The explosion woke sharp echoes from the cliffs. A cloud of large birds rose above the woods and flew heavily in a flock together, like a yellow mist, across the green foliage. Then they sank down again without uttering any sort of call or cry.
"They look like pigeons but must be as big as peacocks," said Jane.
Soon they went below for the noonday meal and something to drink. But they were quickly on deck again and all desirous to land. Tom, however, stuck to his intentions.

"We'll just get a clear idea of the hang of the place," he said, "and drop anchor when we come abreast of the gorge. My only fear is that the heat ashore is going to knock us out."
"To work by night will be best, once we locate the cache," thought Pardo. "The gorge must show up soon."
