Having A Pet Is Good For Child But Means More Work

By OLI DAUM
Canadian Press Staff Writer
TORONTO (CP)—If you want to be kind to animals don't let children under eight years assume the responsibility of their care. So says General Manager E. G. Reade of the Toronto Humane Society.

Mr. Reade said it is good for small children to have pets around the house. It teaches them kindness and consideration not only for animals but also for other humans. But in adopting a pet for youngsters the parents must be prepared to assume full responsibility for its welfare.

"Often children will care well for a pet until the novelty of having it wears off," he said. "Then the child neglects it and parents must be prepared to step in."

LIFE-LONG RELATIONSHIP
Children more than eight years old should be made to understand before they are given a pet that the animal is in their care as long as it lives. They should be given full and proper instructions on feeding, grooming and exercising the animal.

Mr. Reade, a former colonel who was in the Horse Cavalry for 20 of his 30 years in the Army, said 42 per cent of household pets are dogs. Regardless of size and type a dog needs at least 30 minutes in fresh air every day, supervised by a competent person.

Its diet should be based on its size, its type and the work it does. The average pet doesn't need as much to eat as a hunting dog, for instance.

Mr. Reade said that a grown dog needs food just once a day but that a puppy should be fed small amounts four or five times daily and a year-old, twice a day.

Water should be available at all times and occasionally a juicy raw bone.

Owners whose pets explore the neighbors' garbage cans needn't hang their heads in shame, says Mr. Reade. Even the best of them like to have a fling and it doesn't necessarily signify a diet deficiency.

He recommended, however, that pets be discouraged from trespassing on neighbors' property.

"If it tramples on the garden next door the owner will soon become as unpopular as his dog," Mr. Reade said. "Any feeling of respect we have for animals does not come upon us suddenly, it is the result of proper home instruction and we cannot emphasize too strongly the necessity of parents supervising their children in handling pets."

Without intending cruelty toddlers often tease an animal until it becomes mean to protect itself, he said. It could have an adverse effect on the child as well in that it would become fearful of animals.

In case an animal is provoked to meanness—and for its own health—it should be immunized as soon as possible after weaning against distemper, rabies and hepatitis.

NEW CARDIGAN ACCENT

By ALICE ALDEN
JUST like the pullover, the cardigan has been undergoing something of a transformation, albeit rather more subtle. Hadley shows it a new touch in the collar and the front closing. It gives the effect of two tiny collars but really is one with a raised effect in the knitting to give the impression of two club collars. The sleeves have little turned back cuffs and the front closing is spaced with sets of three new pearl buttons. Good for either town or country wear and an addition to any wardrobe.

ELLEN'S DIARY
To School By Sleigh:

We remember now how quietly the snowfall of yesterday came, and at Alderlea how pleased the children were to watch its descent. "You like it?" James queried of Mack, at the time bringing his small wagon to the shelter of the back verandah.

"Yes!" the child's smile was infectious. "Doesn't everybody like to see the first good snowfall?"

"It's nice," he said turning his face up to enjoy the feel of the cool damp flakes.

Granddaughter, of an exploratory turn of mind, hurried in for the magnifying glass to see if she could find a difference in them as she gazed.

Daintily they came down to settle gently on roof and yard until all was white, every twig and branch of shrub and tree, every wire and picket and post was moulded prettily in the soft of its down. And the robins' nests so forlorn of late were now at one, with the landscape as in a deserted farmhouse when a winter-storm dresses it up to the threshold in a robe of unbroken white.

The spruces below the dam, tall and old and wise-spreading, and those which riverward mark the course of the stream, were in no time an engaging picture, the dark branches leed in light and heron-like design as were the hedge rows and fields which reached above to the hills-fields which as late as breakfast-time had been waiting patiently as we had sometimes seen a weary child wait his mother's attention to take him off to lipped prayers and bed.

So the countryside round about Alderlea came yesterday in the Sab bath-quiet to its winter-rest. All white-spread. Only the millpond and stream were dark amid the white that was about.

"It's different, world to what we had yesterday!" Granddaughter commented, adding, "however long it will stay."

We remember the Saturday sunshine, mellow and warm for November. And the sunset as we had ceased to see it across a broad inlet of river. We saw a couple neither young nor old leave their car and walk hand in hand into its westering glow. Symbolic of happy years spent together or perhaps there enjoying the exquisite peace of the time of day and the quiet lap of the tide, keeping a tryst again there, may be one they had known in years that were young. They, and we, have what may be the last sunset of Autumn to remember happily, while a Winter not of the calendar keeps all now in a spell.

Today the children went by sleigh to school—and machines helped by tractors went up the hill to work or on demanding missions of farm, outward bound. To-night the moon smiles down on the white countryside making it a place of enchantment.

"You must come and see how pretty it is from the rise behind the buildings" Granddaughter is here a-begging. "It's", her eyes sparkle, "out of this world!"
