HAD IMPORTANT ROLE

Bundy Often Tabbed Shadow State Sec'y

By LORELIES OLSLAGER WASHINGTON (Reuters) — McGeorge Bundy, a pink-checked former Harvard professor served as a top adviser on national security affairs to U.S. Presidents Kennedy and Johnson, has often been portrayed as shadow secretary of state.

The office he set up for himself in the basement of the White House has been nicknamed "the little state department" and he played an important role in shaping U.S. policy on such crucial matters as Viet Nam, Cuba and the Dominican crisis earlier this year.

But Bundy himself liked to regard his role as that of an adviser rather than a decision-maker.

"Mac," with greish brown hair, a furrowed brow and plastic-framed glasses, has been somewhat of a puzzle to Washington.

He is the last of the group of intellectuals whom Kennedy brought to the White House in 1961 to leave it under the new president, and he certainly encountered less difficulties than most in adjusting to Johnson's different style and habits.

ONSIDERED LIBERAL. Considered a liberal, he surprised many people in that camp by going wholeheartedly along with Johnson on Viet Nam.

Bundy himself defined his political philosophy as follows:

"Acceptance by the United States of its responsibility as a great power; dedication by this great power to the purpose of peace; a commitment of concern by the U.S. for the needs and aspirations of other nations; and awareness of the reality of communism."

"We cannot have peace without power, and power alone does not make peace, he says. 'We cannot limit ourselves to one objective at a time. We, like Caesar, have all things to do at once, and this is hard.'"

Bundy was born March 30, 1919, as the youngest son among five children of a noted Boston lawyer.

He attended, one class behind the same school as the late president Kennedy. Their paths only crossed when by chance they were seated next to each other at a Harvard celebration in 1960.

Ironically, Bundy began his political life as a Republican. He was foreign political adviser to the Republican presidential candidate, Thomas E. Dewey, in 1948.

DEFEATED BY TRUMAN. After Dewey's defeat by Democrat Harry Truman, Bundy became a lecturer in government at Harvard and four years later, at 34, was named dean of arts and sciences there.

Bundy has never achieved the easy-going, smiling manners of the professional politician. His manners often are brusque. "But combining a quick analytical mind with an administrative capacity for action, he proved an invaluable asset to the two presidents he served."

His office is the "brain" of the White House, where all important foreign political information is gathered, sifted for the essentials to be brought to the president's attention, and possible alternative solutions worked out.

"We try to be an extension of the president's range and grasp... we make interim decisions only when we know what he thinks or that he simply wants the matter settled. It is his job, not ours," Bundy once told an interviewer.

HIS WORD GOOD. However, he told other officials "the president wants this done," his word was as good as Johnson's.

His first three months with Lyndon Johnson after Kennedy's assassination were, in Bundy's own words, "a stressful period," but the difficulties were quickly settled.

The reason why Bundy made the transition with such apparent ease and success, observers said, was that he was more devoted to the institution of the presidency than to personalities.

"This country of ours, which is almost ungovernable, has only one engine. That is the presidency. If it doesn't go, there is nothing."

Staff Members Discuss Problem

The problem of getting information to farm families was discussed yesterday by staff members of the provincial department of agriculture. The meetings were held in the Basilica Recreation Centre.

Speakers included Jack MacAndrew, director of public relations for the Confederation Centre. He discussed radio and television usage. Keith Russel, editor Maritime Co-op Services Moncton talked of the farm paper's use.

Neil A. Matheson, farm editor of The Guardian-Patriot, discussed the best ways of reaching farm families through the daily newspapers.

Premier Walter Shaw brought greetings at the opening session. Dave Rogers, director of extension for the department, Bud McMurtry, director of vocational services and Floyd Buell, supervisor of industrial training for P.E.I., were also on the opening panel.

The general program was chaired by Hartwell Daley, who set the day's discussion in motion and was in charge throughout of what in effect was a series of panel discussions. The panel in this case included everyone who was in attendance.

Citadel Cost Seen $90,000

The Salvation Army will build on the site of the old Baptist Church at the corner of Prince and Fitzroy Streets, it was announced yesterday. The new building will cost approximately $90,000.

The old church building will be demolished and work on this will begin in late January or early February. In May, territorial commander for Canada and Bermuda, Commissioner Grinstead will be in Charlottetown for the sod turning ceremony to mark the beginning of construction for the new building.

The architect for the new building is Keith Pickard of Charlottetown and plans are being drawn up now and will soon be completed. The new building is expected to be completed by late next fall.

Art Exhibit Opens Today

A special exhibition of paintings by Nova Scotian artist Carol Fraser opens today at Confederation Centre Gallery, Charlottetown.

Included are works in oils, ink and water colors.

The paintings have resulted from Miss Fraser's recent stay in Provence, France. Many portray aspects of a large garden, and display a unique record of her artistic response to the varying moods of the garden.

Art Director Moncrieff Williamson describes the exhibition as "probably the most significant work of Miss Fraser I have seen up to now. In fact I would say her work is among the most exciting being done in the Maritimes."

The exhibition will be on display until Dec. 31.
