Rahman Finds Sukarno Cocky

HONG KONG (Reuters) — Malaysian Prime Minister Tunku Abdul Rahman said in talks in Tokyo he found Indonesian President Sukarno cocky.

He added: "We hope one day our minds will meet and we expect peace in Asia. At this moment I do not think our minds meet at all."

Rahman was on his way back to Malaysia after unsuccessful summit talks in Tokyo Saturday with Sukarno and Philippines President Diosdado Macapagal.

Indonesia and Malaysia instructed their forces to continue the guerrilla war in Malaysian Borneo after the summit talks ended without agreement on the substance of their bitter dispute.

Both countries agreed in principle to a Philippines proposal for turning the quarrel over to an Afro-Asian conciliation commission.

But Sukarno refused to accept the Malaysian prime minister's condition "all acts of hostility against Malaysia must cease forthwith."

On a brief stop - over here Sunday, Rahman said Sukarno was "as cocky as you will always find him."

He said Malaysia will "defend our territories to the best of our ability and with the assistance of our friends."

Nothing Lavish Planned As Windsor Reaches 70

By RODNEY ANGOVE

PARIS (AP)—The Duke of Windsor will be 70 years old Tuesday.

The former King Edward VIII will have a few friends over to his mansion on the edge of Paris, but nothing lavish.

The duchess will be there, as always the perfect hostess, leading conversation on fashion, the arts, and international society.

But chances are no one will speak of the duke's abdication in 1936, when he stepped down to marry the American-born, twice - divorced, Mrs. Wallis Simpson, whom Britons still refuse to accept as a duchess.

The duke dislikes bringing up his age in public, and declined all requests for birthday interviews. He believes such stories, a spokesman said, smack too much of obituaries.

What counts now are the years since the duke was set on French shores from a British warship—an exiled ex-monarch. PUBLIC WAS HOSTILE

On his own for the first time, he set out to carve himself a private life. In one way it was easy—he had a large private fortune.But in another it was difficult—the Royal Family and a big part of the British public were hostile about his becoming the third husband of a commoner.

There has never been any sign from either that they regretted the marriage that took place June 3, 1937, less than six months after the abdication.

In those happy years the world press followed them from yacht trips off Florida to chateau in France to hunting lodges in Germany — always waving, always smiling. At the start of the Second World War the duke became a liaison officer in France, and in 1940-45 was governor and commander-in-chief of the Bahamas Islands. He has since had no public or private job. But the ex-king, as well as any other large investor, works on the portfolio from which he supports his lavish if gentlemanly spending.

It takes money to support a score of servants in his small though palatial mansion, and his weekend retreat outside Paris, a converted mill with a brook running through the specially designed garden.

The duke is his own investment manager. Although his mansion and mill are both rented, his real properties have ranged from the E. P. Ranch in Alberta and the Canadian Rockies to villa sites on the Spanish coast. And he and the duchess have made money from memoirs and the story of their romance.

HELP CHARITIES

The personal fame they have lent to other enterprise has become well known. Their names at the top of the guest list have spelled success to many a charity function, from costume balls to last year's gambling cruise off New York aboard an ocean liner. As first-nighters and New Year's celebrators in famous spots, they have always been sought by photographers.

In later years they have slowed down somewhat. The duchess still attends many high fashion showings, sometimes setting the fashion herself. She still goes to parties and teas in the most chic neighborhoods.

The duke attends the top-notch sports events with genuine interest. He also goes to the golf course every week.

The couple spends several months a year in the United States, mostly in sunny resorts and New York.

The duke visits Britain occasionally, his last official trip being in 1962 for the funeral of his brother, King George VI. He sees his niece, Queen Elizabeth, once in a while, but his visits are mostly restricted to business. He always leaves the duchess outside Britain but hurries back to her after two or three days away.

Investors In Britain Own Slice Of U.S.

LONDON (AP)—The heavy traffic in capital investment between the United States and Britain has lately posed an intriguing query:

Which country owns more of the other?

Surprisingly, the answer seems to be that Britain has won a bigger slice of the U.S. than Americans own of Britain.

The matter was brought into focus recently when Chrysler Motors set about buying up a modest section of the British motor industry.

For a bid of £12,300,000 Chrysler sought to obtain a holding of 30-35 per cent in Rootes Motors Limited—a company which ranks as one of the smaller British motor manufacturers and which now finds itself in need of fresh capital.

Though the deal involved no change in company control, there were immediate warnings of a creeping tendency for the commanding heights of the British economy to fall under direction of Wall Street.

NEED INVESTMENT

The Conservative government replied that Britain needed foreign investment and anyway it always could forbid any deal which threatened to remove vital British interest from domestic control.

Moreover, said government spokesmen , the movement of international capital is a two-way flow which gives British investors a considerable stake in the U.S. economy.

Intrigued, researchers got down to investigate just how big a stake this is. Their results surprised laymen in general and some of Chrysler's critics in particular.

The set of figures showed that over-all British investment in the U.S. amounte d to around $6,319,000,000 (U.S.) as opposed to an over-all $5,037,000,000 invested by Americans in Britain.

These figures showed the Americans had an edge on direct investment such as in manufacturing, oil, and insurance industries with investments worth $4,550,000,000 against the $2,540,000,000 invested in this way by Britain.

OFFSET DIFFERENCE

But indirect investments, such as government holdings, investment trust, private and company holdings more than offset the difference.

Britain has traditionally enjoyed a big financial stake in the U.S. ever since the days when British finance backed the railways pushing out to California and controlled nine-tenths of the southern cotton plantations.

Many of these interests were sold out during the Second World War. Few people generally realized just how far British investors had climbed back into new American footholds.

A recent report in the Financial Times aid that direct U.S. investment in the United Kingdom expanded by 4½ times in the years from 1950 to 1962.

About 75 per cent of the American investment was made in the last six year of that period.

UN Charter Revision Seen Need

WASHINGTON (AP)—Senator Barry Goldwater (Rep. Ariz.) said here former president, Dwight D. Eisenhower agrees with him that the United Nations charter should be revised and the voting formula changed.

Goldwater, leading candidate for the Republican presidential nomination, said in an interview recorded for the Mutual Broadcasting System's radio network that both Eisenhower and State Secretary Dean Rusk support "a thorough discussion on the charter of the United Nations."

New York Governor Nelson A. Rockefeller and other critics have accused Goldwater of wanting to take the United States out of the United Nations, particularly if Communist China is admitted.

But Goldwater said . "I believe in the United Nations." He added, however, that some was must be found to revise the formula giving each individual nation a vote in the General Assembly.

The UN charter provides for revisions by vote of two-thirds of the membership and unanimous approval by the five permanent members of the Security Council, which include the Soviet Union.

NO ALTERNATIVE

Goldwater said he has no hope "of ever seeing Russia agree to any changes that would react to the weakening of her present power, but I can't see any alternative to trying."

"I say this because we have to face the realities of life," he said . "The chances of Red China coming into the organization grow every day.

Discussing UN peace-keeping operations, Goldwater said he thinks the international organization is empowered to act in Cyprus but "this is more of a problem with NATO than the United Nations."

"I have no criticism of the United Nations moving in Cyprus and doing what they've been doing," he said. "So far I think they're being effective.

"But they certainly didn't bring any order out of the chaos in The Congo. It's worse there than it was before, and I think that it's going to get worse as we go along and I don't think there that another intervention on the United Nations part would be any more productive than the last."

RUSSIA, CHINA FRIENDS

PEKING (Reuters)—Dr. Hewlett Johnson, former dean of Canterbury, said here Thursday he was confident the present Sino - Soviet differences would be resolved and the Chinese and Soviet peoples would "always be firm friends." The 90-year-old churchman, known as the Red Dean, has been on a five-week visit to China, his fifth since 1932, as the guest of Premier Chou En-Lai.
