By Michael Hastings

"Of course I know! Have you no brains at all? You will say to him that you are worried about the passenger who vanished, especially as you saw something that night. He will be most eager to hear what you have to say. He will come in here with you, and you will give him a drink." Prinz gave a humourless smile. "Fortunately there is little selection in these days. He will not see anything strange in being offered no alternative. You bring the drink to him, have one yourself. Be careful not to hesitate with your own glass. Raise it swiftly, making some sort of toast. He will drink. Then begin to talk. Within five minutes he will be powerless. Then you will secure him with ropes and place him upon your bunk."

"And after that?"

"I will do the rest," said Prinz. "I will return here as soon as the entertainment is over."

"What will happen?"

"That will be my concern," Prinz said sharply. "The part you have to play is easy. Remember that, and be thankful that you are not ordered to do more."

"Is—Oliver to vanish?"

"After a time, said Prinz vaguely. "Your story will be that he has been taken ill. You fear infection, and accordingly have placed his cabin out of bounds. As for his watch—it will be taken by one of the crew. Is there anybody?"

"Red Connor, the boatswain, knows some navigation."

"Very well, he will take over."

"And how much do I tell Lacoste?"

Prinz scowled. "You tell him as little as possible. It will be enough for him that Oliver has been taken ill. Are the two such friends that Lacoste will wish to visit him?"

Zakas shook his head.

"So I thought."

Zakas was still alarmed at the scheme.

"So," he said, "his drink will be drugged. But how do I do that? Suppose he sees me drop something into his glass?"

Prinz gave an exclamation of impatience. "Do you not understand that this has been carefully planned?" he demanded. "Do you think that I should trust you to get away with a thing like that? No, I shall deal with the glass." He looked round the cabin. "There is a wooden tray there. Place it on that chest, and put out two glasses. No. On second thought, the glasses can be left until later. In case he comes in to see you before we are ready. But show me where you have glasses."

"I have two here—or do you need tumblers?"

"No, those will be better. Alas, we have no fine wine to offer him for his last drink..."

"Then the drug will kill him?"

Zakas asked, his voice suddenly sharpening with anxiety.

"No. Do you think I would trust you with anything lethal?"

Zakas thought for a minute.

"Perhaps not," he said.

"Now pay attention," said Prinz. "You will be on watch until eight o'clock in the evening."

Zakas nodded. "Yes," he confirmed. "As usual I am taking the two Dog watches. Lacoste relieves me."

"Good. Towards the end of your watch I shall come in here and set out the two glasses."

"If they will spill if the ship rolls much," said Zakas.

"Don't be so impatient! I have not finished yet. Into one of the glasses I shall drop some white powder. I shall add sufficient water to dissolve it. It will be colourless; but the presence of water in one of the glasses will indicate which one you are to pass to Oliver. Do you follow that?"

"Yes, doctor," said Zakas.

"All that you have to do is to pour out—what have you?—I see, whisky. Let him see you take up the bottle. He may have suspicious, so make your actions as open as possible. Pass him his glass. Then drink from your own, quickly. Be as natural as you can."

"Yes," said Zakas in little more than a murmur. He was relieved to find that he had so little to do.

"If you bring Oliver in here about a quarter to nine," said Prinz. "You will not have long to wait before I can join you. You can expect me shortly after half past. Or at a quarter to ten at the latest."

"There is no possibility of him recovering before you can get here?" Zakas asked anxiously.

Prinz laughed. "He will not be conscious of anything for at least three hours," he said. "You understand precisely what you are to do?"

"Yes, doctor," said Zakas meekly. He moistened his lips again, and a cunning gleam came into his eyes.

"I suppose," he said, "that Dr. Rutter will bestow some reward? After all, I have no quarrel with Oliver. In fact, without him, I shall have much more work and greater responsibility."

"With him you'll have the rough feel of a rope round your neck," said Prinz brutally. "However, you will be paid. I can promise you that." He left the cabin without another word.

ZAKAS MAKES A CALL

Captain Zakas sat in his cabin and stared at the two glasses on the small wooden tray. Although he had tried to forget about them, he found it an impossibility to remove his gaze. One was empty; the other a quarter full of water.

which wished gently backwards and forwards in its transparent prison, in time with the movement of the ship. Could he remain in his cabin staring at the glass? He felt that the tension was driving him mad. Would it not, he thought, be better to get it over and done with? That was the only way in which there was likely to be any release from strain. After all, when it was done it was over. There would no longer be such agonies of anticipation.

Honker shook his head. "Not now, anyway. He is too smart."

stood partly among the trees. He was young. He wasn't quite as big as the two fighters but he had a beautiful crown of antlers. They were even bigger than those of Plathorns. He stood right where he was and didn't make a sound, just watched. "Do you suppose he's going to fight too," whispered one of the young Geese.

Honker shook his head. "Not now, anyway. He is too smart."
