NO MORE TRAIN COLLISIONS.

How They May Pass Each Other on the Same Track.

The double pointed electric train shown at the World's Fair, by which it is hoped to make 150 miles per hour, has recalled to a writer in Cassier's Magazine the rather unique solution worked out by some inventive genius several years ago of the interesting problem of how to enable two railroad trains to pass each other on the same track without collision. Heretofore attempts of this kind have been very disastrous. The plan of the genius in question was, after all, very simple, as most really great plans and ideas are. He proposed to place on the front of every locomotive going in one direction a long inclined plane, and on this were to be two rails. These were to come close to the regular track at the forward and lower end of the plane, and at the upper end were to be connected with other rails running along the tops of the cars and down to the main track again on another inclined plane at the rear end of the train. It was explained that when the train provided with this attachment would meet another train on the same track the latter would simply go over the former, its weight making the connection of the front of the inclined plane and the rails of the main track perfect, and acting, at the same time, as a brake on the speed of the train underneath. It is, of course, perfectly evident that if this invention had been properly appreciated and generally adopted, the number of double-track roads the world over would not now be half as great as it is. A single track, with occasional switches for heavy freight trains, would have answered all purposes, and the cost of building railroads would have been decreased by an important percentage. The inventor, of course, fondly hoped to see the system adopted immediately on all single track roads, so that, in a few years, the sensation of riding over or under another moving train would have been so common as to pass almost unnoticed.

Genius Indifferent to Surroundings.

It might be conjectured, perhaps, that Scott's and Byron's genius was favored by the circumstances of their birth; that the wild scenes in which Scott's infancy was passed, and the local legends with which his head was filled, determined him to ballad writing, and that the ballad writing led naturally in its turn to romance; and that the high station and undisciplined liberty of Byron's childhood fostered that passionate self-will and brooding imagination which showed themselves in his fierce, scornful and moody verse. This, we say, might, perhaps, be conjectured with some probability, and the like might be said of Wordsworth's infancy.

But how shall we maintain that the conditions of Keats' Cockney birth in a livery stable, or his education in a dissecting room, favored the growth of that most delicate and rich type of almost Hellenic clearness and beauty of imagination? And how shall we maintain that Dickens' menial tasks in the cotton of blacking bottles fostered the growth of that wonderful humor and that microscopic accuracy of vision which filled the world with laughter and with immitable caricature, such as no comedy, not even Molier's, had anticipated? Again, we would have ventured to predict that a wild, despotic, Irish evangelical spirit like Patrick Bronte, banished to the bleakest of Yorkshire moors, would have been the father of children so eager, original, and vivid in their reveries as those who eventually produced the unique passion of Ellis and Currer Bell's genius? So far as we know anything of the origin of genius, that origin is usually a surprise.

It is the rare exception and not the rule, when we find Chatham succeeding in producing such a hot-house flower as William Pitt, or James Mill, succeeding in elaborating a specimen more perfect than himself of a thinker of his own type, in the studious, diligent, diffuse, lucid, and rather dreary logician and economist, who left his mark on the English philosophy to the third quarter of this century. Nor do we ever find in rare instances of this sort the higher kinds of original genius. Pitt and John Stuart Mill were considerable triumphs of training for a purpose; but that purpose was a very limited one, and had none of the largeness and freshness of vitality which attaches to original genius. —The Spectator.

The Notebook a Detriment.

The young reporter may be known by the prominence which he gives his notebook. He produces it on all occasions and on no occasion at all. A young reporter who had failed to bring out the expected utterance from a prominent politician, and had nothing to show for his labor but a string of colorless platitudes, was lamenting his ill-luck to a veteran. "You used your notebook, didn't you?" asked the latter. The junior admitted the soft impeachment. "You scared the game," said the veteran; "you will never be a good interviewer until you throw away your notebook." And there is much truth in what the veteran said, if you have a good memory and the power of mental concentration to a high degree. Without the presence of the notebook the really important public man will sit back comfortably in the most comfortable chair in the room and let his ideas unguarded play. He will smoke, and, if he is an ambitious man, and the interviewer smokes, he will give the latter a good cigar. Tobacco is a great aid to the indiscretion of utterance that is the making of a good interview.—Boston Transcript.

A Letter From His Dad.

DEAR SON,—

Yours to hand yesterday. It gives me great pleasure in sending you a cheque for $100. Thanks to Prowse Bros. & Co. They have done the people of this country more good and saved them more money than any firm that ever started business in Charlottetown. I am glad you are buying your Furnishings and Carpets from men you can depend on. They won't misrepresent an article to make a sale. You spoke about me recommending anyone who might want a Carpet to trade there. It would be impossible for me to tell anyone who has not already heard of Messrs. Prowse Bros. & Co. Why, your sisters, your cousins and your aunts all trade there. They say their store is like a fair on market days. Crowds of thankful buyers are found pressing their way up to the counters to have a share in the bargains which they daily offer. Good bye.

From your loving
FATHER.
