CHAPTER X.

Lisbeth paused, in listening attitude, without removing her apron from the face.
The voices were strange to her. Could it be her sister's spirit come back to her from the dead after all these years? She trembled, and dared not look.

Dinah, believing that this pause of wonder was in itself a relief for the sorrowing woman, said no more just yet, but quietly took off her bonnet, and then, motioning silence to Seth, who on hearing her voice, had come in with a beating heart, laid one hand on the back of Lisbeth's chair, and leaned over her, that she might be aware of a friendly presence.

Slowly Lisbeth drew down her apron, and timidly she opened her dim dark eyes.
She saw nothing at first but a face—a pure, pale face, with loving gray eyes, and it was quite unknown to her. Her wonder increased; perhaps it was an angel. But in the same instant Dinah laid her hand on Lisbeth's again, and the old woman looked down at it. It was a much smaller hand than her own, but it was not white and delicate, for Dinah had never worn a glove in her life, and her hand bore the traces of labor from her childhood upward. Lisbeth looked earnestly at the hand for a moment, and then, fixing her eyes again on Dinah's face, said, with something of restored courage, but in a tone of surprise,— 'Why, ye're a workin' woman!'

'Yes, I am Dinah Morris, and I work in the cotton-mill when I am at home.'

'Ah!' said Lisbeth slowly, still wondering: 'ye comed in so light, like the shadow on the wall, an' spoke i' my ear, as I thought you might be a spirit. Ye've got a most the face of one as 's a sittin' on the grave i' Adam's new Bible.'

'I come from the Hall Farm now. You know Mrs. Poyser—she's my aunt, and she has heard of your affliction, and is very sorry; and I'm come to see if I can be any help to you in your trouble; for I know your sons Adam and Seth, and I know you have no daughter, and when the clergyman told me how the hand of God was heavy upon you, my heart went out toward you, and I felt a command to come and be to you in the place of a daughter in this grief, if you will let me.'

'An' I know who ye are now; ye are a Methody, like Seth; he's tould on you,' said Lisbeth, fretfully, her overpowering sense of pain returning, now her wonder was gone. 'Ye'll make it out as trouble's a good thing, like he always does. But where's the use o' talkin' to me a-tha't'n! Ye canna make the smart less w' talkin'. Ye canna ne'er make me believe as it's better for me not to ha' my old man die in 's bed if he be must die, an' ha' the parson to pray by 'm, and me to sit by 'm, an' tell me 'er to mind th' ill words I'n gen him sometimes when I wur angered, an' to gi' m' a bit an' sup, as long as a bit an' a sup he'd swallow. But eh! to die i' the cold water, an' us close to 'm, an' ne'er to know; an' me a-sleepin', as if I ne'er belonged to 'm no more nor if he'd been a journeyman tramp from nobody knows where.'

Here Lisbeth began to cry and rock herself again; and Dinah said, 'Yes, dear friend, your affliction is great.
It would be hardness of heart to say that your trouble is not heavy to bear. God didn't send me to you to make light of your sorrow, but to mourn with you, if you will let me. If you had a table spread for a feast, and was making merry with your friends, you would think it was kind to let me come and sit down and rejoice with you, because you would think I should like to share those good things; but I should like better to share in your trouble and your labor, and it would seem harder to me if you denied me that. You won't send me away? You're not angry at me for coming?'

'Nay, nay; angered! who said I wur angered? It wur good on you to come. An' Seth, why donna ye get her some tay? Ye wur in a hurry to get some for me, as had no need, but ye donna think o' gettin' 't for them as wants it. Sit ye down; sit ye down. I thank ye kindly for comin', for it's a little wage ye get by walkin' through the wet fields to see an old woman like me. . . .
Nay, I'n got no daughter o' my own—ne'er had one—an' I wurna sorry, for they're poor queezy things, gells is; I allays wanted to ha' lads, as could fend for their-selves. An the lads 'ull be marryin'—I shall ha' daughters enoo, and too many.
But now, dy you make the tay as ye like it, for I'n got no taste in my mouth this day; it's all one what I swaller—it's all got the taste o' sorrow w' it.'

Dinah took care not to betray that she had had her tea, and accepted Lisbeth's invitation very readily, for the sake of persuading the old woman herself to take the food and drink she so much needed after a day of hard work and fasting.

Seth was so happy now Dinah was in the house that he could not help thinking her presence was worth purchasing with a life in which grief incessantly followed upon grief; but the next moment he reproached himself; it was almost as if he were rejoicing in his father's sad death. Nevertheless the joy of being with Dinah would triumph; it was like the influence of climate, which no resistance can overcome. And the feeling even sufficed itself over the face so as to attract his mother's notice while she was drinking her tea.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

Indignation Meeting at Little York.

Sir,—A large and influential meeting of the inhabitants of Little York and surrounding districts, was held in the Schoolhouse, on Wednesday, the 10th inst., to give expression to their indignation at the gross piece of injustice perpetrated on them by the railway authorities in the closing of York Station.

The meeting was duly organized by appointing A. Gill, Esq., Chairman, and the undersigned Secretary. A letter from Dr.
Jenkins was read to the meeting, stating that he regretted his not being able to attend, but expressing his sympathy, and willingness to do all in his power to have the grievance remedied. Mr. L. H. Davies was also sorry that professional duties prevented his attendance.

Henry Beer, Esq., M. P. P., being called upon, condemned very strongly the action of Mr. Schreiber in this matter, referring to the fact that if economy was the excuse, the whole road might be closed on the same plea.

Hon. Donald Ferguson, on being called on, said he considered the removing of this Station a very short-sighted piece of business on the part of the Chief Engineer, and thought that the Government should hesitate before sanctioning any such measure, emphasizing the fact that very few of the Railways and other public works of the Dominion do pay.

Mr. M. West thought the question at issue a gross outrage on the people of this section of country, and urged that all concerned should lay aside party feeling and unite as one man to defend their rights, which are being trampled on.

Mr. Donald Crockett was willing to admit that the receipts from York Station this year were small, but that fact could be easily explained, as this season has been an exceptional one. For example: Owing to the failure of the potato crop the shipments of starch from this Station the present year are barely one-seventh of what they were last. Consequently the present year's receipts could not, with any degree of fairplay, be taken as a criterion.

Mr. George Vessey claimed that urgent measures had depressed trade, and as a natural consequence railway receipts were small; and was of the opinion that the depriving of a whole township of the benefits of railway and telegraphic privileges for the sake of a paltry two or three hundred dollars could not be condemned too strongly.

Robert Lawson, Esq., considered that a great injustice had been done there; and spoke on the subject forcibly and to the point.

Mr. A. Brown was of the opinion that if proper means were adopted by the railway authorities, this station could be made to pay as well as any other on the line.

The matter of depreciation in value of property was also referred to by several of the speakers, and many other arguments advanced of which it would be impossible to give even a synopsis without taking up too much of your valuable space. The feeling of the meeting can best be judged by the following resolutions submitted by Robert Lawson, Esq., seconded by Donald Crockett, Esq., and carried unanimously.

Resolved, That this meeting has learned with
