"God Save our Gracious Queen. Long Live our noble Queen." "God Save the Queen."

For fifty-six years (some June 20th) our illustrious sovereign has honorably worn the mantle of Queenhood, and each of the fifty-six years has added proofs that the Queen has fitted the mantle as well as the mantle has fitted the Queen.

It has never been our good fortune to supply a green (royal) with a mantle, but we have supplied thousands of our local queens with the most stylish, best-fitting veils with the most Mantles and Jackets and finest finishes. Mantles and Jackets they have ever worn, and we are now in a splendid position to do the same for hundreds more. We ask your special attention to our Mantle and Dress Goods departments.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

The Slate Case.

Sir,—Policeman Campbell's affidavit, published in last evening's Patriot, for the purpose of placing himself right before the public, puts the case of Slate far worse than the public ever imagined it to be. From it it appears that Campbell, during the latter trial, verbally informed Magistrate Fitzgerald that Slate was drunk on a previous day in the city. Upon this mere statement, not under oath, and made behind Slate's back, the Magistrate does not issue a summons as he should have done, but says in effect, "All right, Campbell, bring him up some other time." When the other time arrives Campbell is in St. John, and Slate is lodged in jail to await his convenience. Now I have no doubt if any ordinary citizen had gone to Mr. Fitzgerald and told him about a person being drunk, the Magistrate would have done as the law points out, viz., required a sworn information in writing, upon which he could issue a warrant. It appears, however, when a policeman makes the charge the procedure is different, and a citizen's liberty may be taken away upon the mere statement of one of these gentlemen. Let me follow up the course adopted against Slate. When arraigned, Campbell is in St. John, but will be home next day. An adjournment of the hearing might not be so long until Campbell returns; but this is not done. Slate goes down for a week, and at the end of that time is detained for another week. During all this time Campbell is in the city and available to prove his charge, but no attempt is made to bring the case on for trial, thus leaving Slate in jail for a fortnight on the unsupported word, not even under oath, of a policeman. If the charge was a bona fide one and could be proved, why was it not brought on and heard? No wonder Judge Hodgson put down the extraordinary procedure, declared it illegal, and ordered the jail doors to be opened. Policeman Campbell may have accomplished his purpose by publishing his affidavit, but in doing so some other people have been placed in a pretty queer position. CITIZEN.
