CHAPTER XV.

He was writing his last letter, when he heard in the outer office a voice he thought he knew. He got up and listened. It was so. Of all the voices in the city, this was the one it most dismayed him to hear in his office at the present crisis.

He listened on, and satisfied himself that a fatal blow was coming. He then walked quietly to his table, seated himself, and prepared to receive the stroke with external composure.

Penfold announced Mr. Burtenshaw.

"Show him in," said Wardlaw, quietly.

Mr. Burtenshaw one of the managers of Morland's bank, came in, and Wardlaw motioned him courteously to a chair, while he finished his letter, which took only a few moments.

While he was sealing it, he half turned to his visitor, and said:

"No bad news? Morland is safe, of course?"

"Well," said Burtenshaw, "there is a rumour upon the bank—a severe one. We could not hope to escape the effects of a panic."

He then, after an uneasy pause, and with apparent reluctance, added:

"I am requested by the other directors to assure you it is their present extremity opinion that—in short, we are really compelled to beg you to repay the amount advanced to you by the bank."

Wardlaw showed no alarm, but great surprise. This was clever, for he felt great alarm, and no surprise.

"The $84,000?" said he. "Why, that advance was upon the freight of the 'Proserpine.' Forty-five thousand ounces of gold. She ought to be here by this time. She is in the Channel at this moment, no doubt."

"Excuse me; she is overdue, and the underwriters are uneasy. I have made inquiries."

"At any rate, she is fully insured, and you hold the policies. Besides the name of Wardlaw on your books should stand for bullion."

Burtenshaw shook his head.

"Names are at a discount to-day, sir. We can't pay you down on the counter. Why, our depositors look cross at Bank of England notes."

To an inquiry—half ironical—whether the managers really expected him to find $81,000 cash at a few hours' notice, Burtenshaw replied, sorrowfully, that they felt for his difficulty whilst deploring their own; but that, after all, it was a debt; and, in short, if he could find no means of paying it, they must suspend payment for a time, and issue a statement—and—

He hesitated to complete his sentence, and Wardlaw did it for him.

"And ascribe your suspension to my inability to refund this advance?" said he, bitterly.

"I am afraid that is the construction it will bear."

Wardlaw rose, to intimate he had no more to say.

Burtenshaw, however, was not disposed to go without some clear understanding.

"May I say we shall hear from you, sir?"

"Yes."

And so they wished each other good morning, and Wardlaw sank into his chair. In that quiet dialogue, ruin had been inflicted and receive without any apparent agitation; aye, and worse than ruin—exposure.

Morland's suspension, on account of money lost by Wardlaw & Son, would at once bring old Wardlaw to London, and the affairs of the firm would be investigated, and the son's false system of book-keeping be discovered.

Wardlaw sat stupefied awhile, then put on his hat and rushed to his solicitor; on the way he fell in with a great talker, who told him there was a rumour that the "Shannon" was lost in the Pacific.

At this he nearly fainted in the street, and his friend took him back to his office in a deplorable condition. All this time he had been feigning anxiety about the "Proserpine," and concealing his real anxiety about the "Shannon." To do him justice, he lost sight of everything in the world now but Helen. He sent old Penfold in hot haste to Lloyd's, to inquire for news of the ship, and then he sat down sick at heart; and all he could do now was to open her portrait, and gaze at it through eyes blind with tears. Even a vague rumour, which he hoped might be false, had driven all his commercial maneuvers out of him, and made all other calamities seem small.

And so they all are small, compared with the death of the creature we love.

While he sat thus, in a stupor of fear and grief, he heard a well-known voice in the outer office; and next after Burtenshaw's, it was the one which caused him the most apprehension. It was his father's.

Wardlaw senior rarely visited the office now, and this was not his hour. So Arthur knew something extraordinary had brought him up to town. And he could not doubt that it was the panic, and that he had been to Morland's or would go there in the course of the day; but, indeed, it was more probable that he had already heard something, and was come to investigate.

Wardlaw senior entered the room.

"Good-morning, Arthur," said he; "I've got good news for you."

Arthur was quite startled by an announcement that accorded so little with his expectations.

"Good news—for me?" said he, in a faint incredulous tone.

"Ay, glorious news! Haven't you been anxious about the 'Shannon' I have, more anxious than I would own."

Arthur started up.

"The 'Shannon'! God bless you, father!"

"She lies at anchor in the Mersey! rescued the old man, with all a father's pride at bringing such good news. 'Why, the Rollstones will be in London at 2.15. See; here is his telegram.'

At this moment in ran Penfold, to tell them that the "Shannon" was up at Lloyd's—had anchored off Liverpool last night.

There was a hearty shaking of hands, and Arthur Wardlaw was the happiest man in London—for a little while.

"Get the telegram at Elm-trees, this morning, and came up by the first express," said Wardlaw senior.

The telegram was from Sir Edward Rollston.

"Reached Liverpool last night; will be at Euston at 2.15."

"Not a word from her?"

"Oh, there was no time to write; and ladies do not use the telegram." He added slyly: "Perhaps she thought coming in person would do as well, or better, eh?"

But why does he telegraph you instead of me?"

"I am sure I don't know. What does it matter? Yes, I do know. It was settled months ago that he and Helen should come to me at Elm-trees, so I was the proper person to telegraph. I'll go and meet them at the station; there is plenty of time. But, I say, Arthur have you seen the papers? Barry Brothers obliged to wind up. Mayle and Cox, of Liverpool, gone; Atlantic trading; Terry and Brown suspended; International credit gone. Old friends, some of these. Hopley and Timms, railway contractors, failed, sir; liabilities, seven hundred thousand pounds and more."

"Yes, sir," said Arthur, pompously; "I will long be remembered for its revelations of commercial morality!"

The old gentleman, on this, asked his son, with excusable vanity, whether he had done all in steering clear of speculation; he then congratulated him on having listened good advice, and stuck to legitimate business. "I must say, Arthur, added he, 'your books are models for any trading firm.'"

Arthur winced in secret under this praise, for it occurred to him that in a few days his father would discover those books were all a sham, and the accounts a fabrication.

However, the unpleasant topic was soon interrupted and effectually too; for Michael looked in with an air of satisfaction on his benevolent countenance, and said:

"Gentlemen, such an arrival! Here is Miss Rouse's sweetheart that she dreamed was drowned."

"What is the man to me?" said Arthur, peevishly. He did not recognize Wylie under that title.

"Is Mr. Arthur why, he is the mate of the 'Proserpine,' said Penfold.

"What! Wylie! Joseph Wylie? cried Arthur, in a sudden excitement, that contrasted strangely with his previous indifference.

Success in Business.

Success in business, as every merchant knows, is easier to talk about than attain. It is easier to put down expected profits on paper, than to put down the right kind of paper on the bank counter. There are certain principles and rules of action necessary on the part of the business man or success will not follow his efforts. It is essential for one who is launching into business to know the different points of the compass, and have a good chart before him, as for a pilot who has been entrusted with a valuable cargo. Those who are already on a voyage and have had, so far, fair winds cannot expect that these will always last. To be successful, if the storm should come, they must be prepared.

An old merchant who lately retired with a fortune, said: "I always made a point during the time I was in business to keep a good stock of goods on hand of those goods that were in general demand, and marked the price at a small advance upon the cost price. On those goods in less demand my profits were a fraction more. I never mis-stated the quality of my goods—always representing them as they were. This gave my patrons confidence in me and they would as soon send their children for what they needed as to come themselves. I had to sell cheap; consequently had to purchase as low as possible. In doing this I always kept myself posted as to prices, which I found was only to be accomplished through some mercantile papers that were not controlled by large jobbing houses. I also inaugurated the system of short credits and long friends; consequently when I closed up business, my book accounts were few and in small amounts. If a man expects to be successful in business, he must be honest—that is, give sixteen ounces to the pound; four quarts to the gallon; four full pecks to the bushel; and always post himself as to the price of goods.

General News Notes.

The first imprint of the now revised German Bible was recently presented to the Emperor William.

Epitaph copied in a French cemetery:
"I AWAIT MY HUSBAND."

And below:—

President Arthur entertains less in a general way than any of his predecessors in twenty years, although he extends a generous hospitality to his intimate circle of friends and adherents.

The only copy of the London Times ever issued on a Sunday was an "extra" sent out in 1847 containing an announcement that saved the Bank of England from a serious "run."

In 1852 Mr. Gladstone wrote a letter in which he alluded to his future great opponent Mr. Disraeli, as a man of unscrupulousness and second motives—at once the necessity of Lord Derby and his curse.
